

TSHEKEDI KHAMA PAPERS

Title: Tshekedi Khama Papers

Reference: KHAM

Creator: Khama, Tshekedi (1905-1959) Regent of Bangwato Tribe

Biographical history and context:

Tshekedi Khama, son of Khama III (the Great) Chief of the Bamangwato (or Bangwato) nation, was born 17 May 1905. According to tribal tradition, Tshekedi's half brother Sekgoma (b. 1869) was heir apparent, being the senior son from a senior wife, but the deaths of Khama III in 1923 and Sekgoma in 1925 set in motion the historic events that are now an integral part of modern-day Botswana. Four-year-old Seretse Khama, the son of Sekgoma, succeeded his father while his uncle, Tshekedi, became his guardian and Regent.

The Bamangwato tribe was the largest in the British Protectorate of Bechuanaland, and Tshekedi, during Seretse's minority, ruled over some 60,000 people in the biggest tribal area (40,000 square miles). The tribe's social relations were equalitarian, though members of the royal family, big cattle owners and, increasingly, educated men, were particularly respected. In particular, reverence for the chieftainship was deep seated. Tshekedi had great responsibilities and wide privileges: to keep law and order, punish crime, collect taxes, allocate the use of collectively owned land, give ear to all in need of counsel or help, and attend the kgotla (the traditional forum of elders for discussion of political and civil issues). He sought to unite the tribe in the face of dynastic disputes and establish efficient tribal administration. The Chief (or kgosi) was also the main instrument for implementing the British Government's policy in the tribal lands.

Boer encroachment from South Africa during the late 19th Century had led the three main Batswana chiefs to make a strategic pact to seek protectorate status with Britain. The British actually declared a protectorate first south of Botswana in 1884 to keep out the Boers, and secondly over southern Botswana in 1885 to keep out Germany. Thus on 27th January 1885 the British Protectorate of Bechuanaland under the High Commission for South Africa was established, the British hoping it would be later absorbed into the Union of South Africa. Mafikeng was chosen as capital, even though it was in South Africa, because it was an area almost entirely inhabited by Tswana speakers.

Links between British and African administrations were established in 1920 with the appointment of the Native Advisory Council, consisting of 35 chiefs and tribal representatives chosen in kgotla, under the presidency of the Resident Commissioner, and the seven member European Advisory Council. The Native Council, which could only discuss and advise, met annually. It was handicapped by the Bamangwato's refusal to join it because Khama III thought each tribe could more satisfactorily deal with its own problems. Sekgoma and Tshekedi followed his example.

Ultimate responsibility for Britain's High Commission Territories in southern Africa lay with the High Commissioner who was also Governor-General of South Africa. (In 1929-31 South Africa became autonomous with its own Governor-General separate from the High Commissionership). An Imperial Secretary advised the High Commissioner on Territories' matters and supervised the Resident Commissioner of each Territory. The latter, with assistance of a Government Secretary, supervised Magistrates stationed in various districts. Under the system of indirect rule, the Chief or Native Authority was supposed to have a large measure of independence and to receive the advice of the Resident Magistrate and technical officers on the Resident Commissioner's staff. However, his powers were gradually curbed. The High Commissioner had overall power to depose or banish Chiefs; the Resident Magistrate heard cases involving Europeans, serious cases in which sentence of death might be involved, and appeals from the Chief's kgotla; he conveyed Government's instructions and communications to the Native Authority; he disbursed Government monies. The colonial officials also administered the Crown Lands and the blocks of European farms. In 1950 the European and Native Advisory Councils were combined to form the Joint Advisory Council].

In 1945 Tshekedi sent his ward Seretse to England to continue his education, studying law at Oxford and then at the Inner Temple in London. It was while in London in 1947, that Seretse met Ruth Williams, a WAAF driver during the Second World War and then working as a clerk for Lloyds. Their marriage in 1948 threw southern Africa into political turmoil. In September 1948 Seretse sent an air-mail letter to his uncle, announcing that he planned to marry Ruth on 2nd October. When Tshekedi expressed his strong disapproval at the proposal, believing it to be contrary to tribal custom, and pressed the London Missionary Society to intervene to prevent the marriage, Seretse defied him and brought the planned wedding date forward to 24th September. However, the Vicar of St. George's, Camden Hill, who had agreed to conduct the marriage ceremony, lost his nerve in the face of mounting opposition and referred them to the Bishop of London, who was officiating at an ordination ceremony at St. Mary Abbot's, Kensington. The couple sat through the ordination service only to be told that the Bishop was not prepared to allow the marriage to take place in church without the approval of the British government. Both knew that this was unlikely to be forthcoming. Consequently on 29th September 1948, in the face of all opposition, Seretse Khama married Ruth Williams at Kensington Registry Office.

The diplomatic storm was just beginning. Seretse was summoned back to Bechuanaland by Tshekedi, arriving there on 22nd October 1948, and faced a four day grilling at the full tribal kgotla, from 15th to 19th November, for breaking tribal custom and disregarding the regent's command. 'The tribe at this first meeting, with almost one voice, condemned the marriage and resolved that all steps should be taken to prevent Seretse's white wife from entering the Bamangwato Reserve'. However, Seretse was adamant that he would not return to the Reserve without his wife, and suspicions began to arise among the people that Tshekedi was aiming to banish Seretse and to claim the chieftainship for himself. Therefore at a second meeting of the kgotla in December, a significant number of tribesmen withdrew their objection to the marriage and demanded a guarantee that Seretse would be allowed to return freely to his tribal lands if he went back to England to pursue his legal studies. When Seretse did return from London to the Protectorate in June 1949 and made it clear that he would leave permanently if his wife were not allowed to join him, a third kgotla meeting agreed to accept him as their Chief on any terms and, on 20th August, Ruth Khama arrived at Serowe, the capital of the Bamangwato. In this unexpected turn of events, Tshekedi found his authority overthrown by the vast majority of the tribe which he had ruled with a firm hand for over twenty years. In a bid to regain support, he threatened to leave his people and settle in voluntary exile in the Bakwena Reserve. Consequently, Tshekedi left his homeland unopposed, accompanied by a band of loyal followers. He went into exile and established a settlement about two miles outside Bangwato territory, with about 1000 supporters.

However, Seretse's future as Chief was far from secure. The marriage upset racially segregated South Africa and Rhodesia, and while Bechuanaland was under its protection, Britain claimed the right to ratify any succession. Yielding to pressure, it banished Seretse from his own country, forcing him to live in exile in Britain which led to a huge controversy, widely reported in the media, over the denial of the couple's fundamental human rights.

In 1952 Seretse was excluded permanently from the Chieftainship and his native land. Ironically Tshekedi, who was still living in the Bakwena Reserve, was also banned from the Bamangwato reserve, whilst the British arranged for a caretaker government, incorporating a Native Authority. But they were not forgotten and there were various influential interventions. In 1956 the Bamangwato cabled the Queen to ask for the return of Seretse, and after both he and Tshekedi, already reconciled, had signed undertakings renouncing the chieftainship for themselves and their heirs and agreeing to live in harmony with each other, they were allowed to return home as private citizens. The British Government announced its new policy: 'Seretse Khama and Tshekedi Khama handed to the Secretary of State a document signed by both in which Seretse Khama formally renounced for himself and for his children all claim to the chieftainship of the Bamangwato tribe, and Tshekedi Khama, who had previously renounced for himself and his children all claim to the Chieftainship, reaffirmed his renunciation.

'Both Seretse Khama and Tshekedi Khama expressed the hope that Seretse would be allowed to return to the Bamangwato as a private person and that both he and Tshekedi Khama would be permitted to take part in the political life of the tribe. Each undertook to cooperate fully with Rasebolai Kgamane, the African Authority appointed by the High Commissioner. .. In furtherance of the policy of Her Majesty's Government a Tribal Council of an advisory nature is to be established for the Bamangwato. Rasebolai Kgamane, as the African Authority, will be Chairman of this Council when it is established'.

After a few years living as a cattle rancher and dabbling in local politics, Seretse was motivated to enter national politics. He founded the Bechuanaland Democratic Party, which won the 1965 elections; the prelude to his country's gaining independence as Botswana in 1966. He was knighted that year and became Botswana's first president, serving a total of four presidential terms before his death in 1980 at the age of 59.

For Tshekedi it was also a new beginning. Rasebolai and Seretse relied considerably on his experience and together they began to restore the economic, political and administrative life of the tribe.

On his death on 10 June 1959, the BBC carried the following news item: 'Tshekedi Khama, the former Regent of the Bamangwato tribe in Bechuanaland and uncle of Seretse Khama, died in a London hospital early today. He was 54. He had flown to Britain over a fortnight ago for treatment for a kidney complaint. On Monday, Seretse Khama - the former Paramount Chief of the tribe - flew to London to see him. Tshekedi was Regent during his nephew's minority and went into voluntary exile in 1949 - along with more than forty headman of the tribe - as a protest against Seretse's marriage to a white woman, Ruth Williams, a London typist. The British Government then banished him for three years. He returned home as a private citizen in 1952. Tshekedi was an able and progressive administrator, whose name first became widely known when he ordered the flogging of a European in 1933.'

Similar reports that dwelt largely on the more sensational aspects of exile, flogging and on his nephew's marriage appeared in other newspapers. A different picture was presented by 'The Times' which spoke of Tshekedi's immense drive and vigour, of the quality of happy living that he brought to everything in which he engaged, and paid tribute to his constructive work in the Bamangwato tribe and his remarkable mastery of the British political system and scene. 'More than once he was involved in great controversies, but he was without bitterness. He believed that white and black had to live together and his advice was always on the side of moderation, negotiation and faith in the future'.

Tshekedi was married to Ella Moshola, a nurse, in 1938. They had four sons: Leapeetswe, Sekgoma, Modiri and Mphoeng, and one daughter, Semane.

Collection includes papers of other family members.

Covering dates: 1889-1997

Extent and media: 10 metres. Paper, vinyl, textiles.

Language: English, Setswana, Afrikaans

Provenance:

The University of Botswana Library was approached by the Tshekedi Khama Estate in 1999, and offered the Tshekedi Khama papers held at Pilikwe, to ensure their preservation, conservation and availability for researchers. It was intended that an inventory was to be drawn up and then presented to the Khama family to help them decide what should be made public or what should be closed, and that a contractual agreement would be signed. The collection included a substantial quantity of books and also papers belonging to other members of the Khama family. At that time only the bibliographic material was inventoried.

In February 2006, a further tranche of records was received, previously in the custody of Dr Leloba Molema, of UB, and Ella Khama's niece. Most significantly this contained subject files of Tshekedi's correspondence. This material is likely to be that material borrowed by historian Michael Crowder from the Khama III Memorial Museum c.1986.

Appraisal:

Almost half the collection comprises papers of family members. Ephemeral family papers without historical or research value (such as school course notes and literature, personal correspondence) were separated out for return to the Khama family.

Arrangement:

Tshekedi's original classification and filing system was deconstructed in c.1981, although the file covers remain. The records have been sorted according to normal conventions, but any remnants of original order have been respected.

KHAM/1/9 Tshekedi's arguments and evidence against Native Proclamations 74 and 75 of 1934

File of papers which appear to be in four separate, but incomplete sections, comprising:

- Paper beginning: '2. On the system which I found in vogue in the administration of tribal affairs and which system I again divide into the following sub-headings: (a) the judicial system, (b) the administrative system.' pp1-15
- Paper entitled: 'Evidence continued (b) The Administrative System', pp.1-10
- Paper beginning page 3, giving a detailed, historical chronology of matters relating to tribal rule and customs in relation to colonial administration from [1876] to 1945, ending 'Finally, I should like to stress that we would be only too willing to remove any defects there may be in the Administration of the nation, but such defects have never been pointed out to us, and I challenge that I be confronted with any instances where any defects in the administration have been pointed and we refused to co-operate with our protectors and guardians to put such defects right'. pp 3-19. [Note that the second paper on the Administrative System, ends with exactly the same words].

- Paper beginning: 'Having dealt with the Proclamations in detail, I now want to record my attitude and actions since their promulgation.' Originally this was accompanied by various pieces of supporting evidence. Unnumbered pages; ends 5th page; incomplete.

Papers would appear to date from around 1935. However, the file cover in which they were stored has been labelled (probably by Mary Benson, Tshekedi's biographer), as '65. TK's case widens, 1952-3'

KHAM/3/6/3 Tshekedi Khama petitions regarding the new Proclamations

File contains petitions to the High Commissioner's office and other prominent British citizenry regarding the new Native Proclamations that affected Native Rule. The petitions were forwarded with the intention that they reached His Majesty's Privy Council for consideration. Also included are letters of support from the Barolong and Ngwaketse Tribal Authorities. The Ngwaketse Authority forwarded a communiqué to Tshekedi informing him of that tribe's refusal to accept the new laws. The Barolong statement was of support to Tshekedi's cause and encouragement for his office to continue pressing for a hearing. His office was seen as having a bigger voice that could and should speak for all other Native offices, especially the smaller ones.

Tshekedi seems to have maintained quite a sophisticated subject based filing system, with alpha numeric coding. However, at some point the contents of the files have been removed, probably by Tshekedi's biographer Mary Benson in c.1981. Most papers were found loose or stored within blank or modern covers. However, the old filing covers still remain to show how material was originally arranged. They indicate also that some material has probably been lost over the years.

The loose correspondence has been sorted by correspondent and listed within thematic sub-series to aid user access. However, where correspondence and papers on a certain subject were found stored together, this arrangement has been respected, whether it was Tshekedi's original arrangement or one created subsequently.

KHAM/5/4/1 Wartime letters

More than 10,000 Bechuana served in World War II, in Syria and the Middle East.

'Forces airmail letter-cards were the primary means of maintaining interpersonal contact throughout the long years of wartime separation. Affairs of the heart and domestic news were their common fare, though they were also vital aids in the maintenance of parental and tribal control, and conduits for the allocation of resources. The Administration asked the Chiefs to always keep before their people the pressing need to write letters, for though all people had to endure separation, the soldiers were cut off from their known world and forced to adapt quickly to the vagaries of life in an alien military establishment in wartime. Families at home felt the need to write letters - especially if they were illiterate - less than the troops felt the need to receive them. In 1944 the Resident Commissioner told the Chiefs and their councillors that 'the men thirst for home news and some wives and families do not write as often as they might' ... Through letters Tshekedi Khama kept a close eye upon

Bakalanga men serving in his Bangwato Companies, and the documentary evidence shows how rigid was the maintenance of tribal control under this most thorough of Chiefs. Through sergeants and sergeant majors he was able to have eyes and ears everywhere at the front, reporting regularly and listing the names of people to be kept under surveillance.'

[From Jackson, Ashley: 'Botswana 1938-1945: An African Country at War' 1999, pp.107-115.]

KHAM/5/6/1 Deposition of Tshekedi after flogging of Phinehas McIntosh

The McIntosh affair had its rather curious origins in 1930 when the hospital in Serowe was being built. Much to the horror of both Tshekedi and Colonel Rey, the British Resident Commissioner in Mafikeng, numbers of the white men involved in this project developed relationships with the local women. Both deplored this 'degenerate' behaviour and vainly sought means of putting a stop to it, Tshekedi being particularly concerned about the number of children resulting from such liaisons who were being left on the margins of society.

Perhaps involved in such early affairs were two tearaway white youths, Phinehas McIntosh and Henry McNamee, both presumably of Scots descent who, from the record, later enjoyed a life style not so dissimilar to that enjoyed by many today. They lacked the cash to own and drive fast, expensive cars but for three years they boozed, got drunk, fought and fornicated. Without doubt, they were a social menace. The problem was that they were white residents of a black town. Colonial convention demanded that they had to be brought to order by a white, not black, authority.

In this case, it seems probable that successive British District Commissioners failed to respond adequately to Tshekedi's requests that they deal with these two. When they were involved in yet another incident involving assault, Tshekedi heard the case in the kgotla. What happened next is unclear because of the lack of written records. Tshekedi may or may not have sentenced McIntosh to be lashed. If he did, McIntosh apparently moved towards Tshekedi, perhaps to appeal.

Kgotla officials took the move as a threat, threw him to the ground and gave him two lashes. Was he lashed for creating mayhem in Serowe or for physically threatening Tshekedi? As with so other key aspects of this bizarre affair, no one can now know. But for Lt. Col. Charles Rey in Mafikeng, it hardly mattered. From Rey's first days in office, he and Tshekedi had contrived to get up each other's noses. Each made it his business to sort the other out. When Rey received the news from Serowe that Tshekedi had 'flogged' a white man, he remarked to his Private Secretary, 'I've got the little bugger now.' It is immaterial, he argued, 'whether McIntosh is a native clothed in a white skin. A fundamental principle is at stake and Tshekedi should be put in his place'.

Anticipating all the arguments that would be used about the Seretse-Ruth marriage, Rey raved on. The government would be held in contempt, the administration would collapse, the safety of European residents would be in jeopardy and South Africa would be bound to react. In Pretoria, Vice Admiral E.R.G.R. Evans was the Acting British High Commissioner and Commander-in-Chief of the Africa Station of the Royal Navy. Evans was a close friend of Oswald Pirow, the pro-Nazi Minister of Defence. Pirow was supportive of the idea that the British should bomb Serowe but was happy instead to help Evans and Rey put everything on a war footing by facilitating the movement through South Africa of 165 marines and naval ratings with four small field guns. Unfortunately such was their eagerness to put Tshekedi in his place, that they had overlooked the need to consult the Commission's legal advisor (Leslie Blackwell) or even to inform the Dominions Office in London.

Both Blackwell and Shirley Eales, Administrative Secretary, were horrified that a small affair should have been so taken out of proportion, and tried to get the expedition stopped. They failed. Evans eventually informed London that he was sending a naval expedition into the Kalahari, that he was setting up a Commission of Enquiry and was suspending Tshekedi until, this inevitably found him guilty.

The unbelievable farce was duly played out. McIntosh told the Enquiry that he had no complaints and respected Tshekedi as his Chief. And Nelson's Royal Navy came to Serowe, pointed its guns at a gathering of incredulous Bangwato and assembled 'whites' and then left leaving behind it a long standing but unfortunately unproven story that Tshekedi had sent his mephato to help the marines dig their guns out of the Ngwato sand. Tshekedi was banished to the Tati District (for just 11 days) where he promptly announced that he would be going to London to make his case.

McIntosh and McNamee, without being found guilty of anything, were sent to non-tribal Lobatse. Evans went back to his flagship in Simonstown and Rey, still believing himself the victor over Tshekedi, returned to Mafikeng.

In London, J.H. Thomas, Secretary of State for the Dominions who had met and admired Tshekedi, saw matters differently. If Tshekedi would state his acceptance of the key principle (to the British) that white could not be tried by black, he could be restored to office without the need of an awkward visit to London.

He (Thomas) would then be able to offer vague statements of support for the action taken by Rey and Evans, tide over the embarrassing incident and restore Tshekedi as Acting Chief.

When Tshekedi duly obliged by making a fulsome statement accepting what was required of him, Rey was able to claim that, 'the little bugger' had been forced to make a climb down. With that objective 'achieved', Rey and Evans then returned to Serowe where they solemnly restored a supposedly contrite Tshekedi to the office he had held before he 'flogged' McIntosh.

Re-examined today, this extraordinary and ridiculously played out incident can easily be dismissed as one of the great follies of the British Empire. But it wasn't all about nothing because many of its key elements continue to be of great concern today - the balance of power between centre and periphery, the adequate definition of powers, respect for the law and for human rights and, above all, for a realisation that the sex drive is non-racial and crosses all boundaries.

As Michael Crowder explains, "what McIntosh unintentionally did was to raise the whole question of sexual relations between white and black in a part of Africa where most whites held strong views on the subject.

Among white residents in Serowe he was not alone in his attentions to Bangwato ladies; nor did the majority of Batswana have as puritan a view of extra-marital sex as did the Administration and Tshekedi".'

KHAM/5/6/2 Letters of support of Tshekedi, after Phinehas McIntosh disposition

In his book 'The Flogging of Phinehas McIntosh' Michael Crowder wrote: 'Some indication of the remarkable interest in Tshekedi's case can be seen in the file of "Letters of Support" Tshekedi kept in his personal archive. To many of these letters he seems to have sent replies, though only a few have carbon copies. A number of his correspondents were former missionaries who knew either Tshekedi or his father. Others were former Serowe residents. All exude warmth for Tshekedi and his people.'

Primarily letters of support but also includes a few letters written before the events unfolded and others on unrelated business. Correspondence as follows:

KHAM/5/6/4 Moeng College papers

For ten years Tshekedi had been discussing the idea of the secondary school with the tribe. He spoke of it in kgotlas in outlying districts as well as in Serowe, until he knew he had the approval of the whole tribe. He had first submitted an outline of the scheme to the Administration in 1939, but after much study and consultation with such authorities as the Oxford University Education Department, he prepared a new memorandum in 1945..

'Suggestions for the establishment of a secondary and industrial school'. His people, he said.. ..

‘should be trained to understand their country’s needs and resources, and they must be fully capable of providing the needs of a free, responsible self-governing Territory in its administrative social, agricultural, industrial, and economic life and development and of bearing the main responsibilities and initiative, as is implied in the spirit of Indirect Rule. This would only be possible if the policy of education were such as to provide a sound modern academic training as an integral part of and not as an alternative to agricultural or industrial training.’ His object was ‘to train a community which will become a worthy asset and an integral part of the economic life and well-being of the Territory’. Ideally, there would be courses in agriculture, animal husbandry, carpentry, building, mechanics, domestic science and mothercraft, shorthand, typing and book-keeping, as well as general academic subjects, all students to be at the same centre, taking a share in the institute’s farming operations, so that it would typify a community... The outlay needed was £100,000 (10,000 cattle) which was raised by levies that Tshekedi had imposed over the years... The site had long been ready. Khama had bequeathed to Tshekedi the secret of a valley called Moeng. .. although it was only 50 miles east of Palapye it was quite inaccessible.

A different official approach might have aroused in Tshekedi a vision for a Protectorate-wide secondary school in a more accessible place .. Instead, the lack of interest, alternating with criticism, only stiffened Tshekedi’s determination. .. Plans for the college were drawn up and Professor Z.K. Matthews was one of the people appointed to the advisory committee. A South African contractor was hired.. Between 1946 and 1946 several visitors to Bechuanaland reported on the progress. .. In June 1948 Tshekedi was told that deep cracks were appearing in the walls of several buildings.. The setback meant that tribal labour had to be kept on the job long after the scheduled time and prolonged consultations were carried on with lawyers and contractors. By October 1948 the emergency rebuilding and delays in brickmaking led to an over-expenditure of £18,900. The Administration, afraid of Tshekedi's enthusiasm, wanted to set a ceiling to what they felt was his extravagance. An ultimatum was given: building operations must cease unless an immediate deposit was paid on the £30,000 endowment fund.. .. Fortunately, Anthony Sillery, the Resident Commissioner, agreed to a compromise...Eventually the legal dispute was settled out of court and the school was opened in 1949 with 122 pupils.'

This series of correspondence and papers was found stored largely in chronological order. It is not clear whether this was the original arrangement. Some rearrangement has taken place to keep papers from individual correspondents together. Other papers are arranged by type.

KHAM/5/6/9 Tshekedi vs Keaboka Tsametse Kgamane

This case arose as the result of Tshekedi's banishment / retirement from the Bamangwato Reserve in 1949. Keaboka Kgamane, next in line as Chief after Seretse, Tshekedi and Rasebolai, was appointed as senior tribal representative by the District Commissioner. Tshekedi alleged Kgamane requisitioned and removed various of Tshekedi's personal property, including grain, cattle, lion skins, wood and iron stores, and evicted residents from his houses and removed the furniture.

Correspondence regarding settlement of costs, with attorneys Fairbridge Arderne and Lawton, Warren & Coulson; Douglas Buchanan; Office of High Commissioner; plus memorandum of costs of litigation; Plaintiff's Declaration; notes of meeting between Tshekedi, Office in Charge and District Commissioner.
