

THE MONASTERY.

A ROMANCE.

BY THE AUTHOR OF „WAVERLEY.“

IN THREE VOLUMES.

VOL. II.

SECOND EDITION.

BERLIN,

PRINTED FOR ADOLPH MARTIN SCHLESINGER.

1822.

THE

MOZARTS

A ROMANCE

IN THREE ACTS

BY THE AUTHOR OF "MARTHA"

CHAPTER I

IN THREE ACTS

VOL. II

THE

MOZARTS

A ROMANCE

IN THREE ACTS

BY THE AUTHOR OF "MARTHA"

CHAPTER I

IN THREE ACTS

VOL. II

THE MONASTERY.

CHAPTER I.

The Miller was of manly make,
To meet him was no mows;
There durst na ten come him to take,
Sae noited he their pows.

Christ's Kirk on the Green.

It was after sunset, as we have already stated, when Halbert Glendinning returned to the abode of his father. The hour of dinner was at noon, and that of supper about an hour after sunset at this period of the year. The former had passed without Halbert appearing; but this was no uncommon circumstance, for the chase or any other pastime which occurred, made Halbert a frequent neglecter of hours; and his mother, though angry and disappointed when she saw him not at table, was so much accustomed to his occasional absence, and knew so little how to teach him more regularity, that a testy observation was almost all the censure with which such omissions were visited.

On the present occasion, however, the wrath of good Dame Elspeth soared higher than usual. It was not merely on account of the special tup's-head and trotters, the haggis and the side of mutton, with which her table was set forth, but also because of the arrival of no less a person than Hob Miller, as he was universally termed, though the man's name was Happer.

The object of the Miller's visit to the tower of Glendearg was like the purpose of those embassies which potentates send to each other's courts, partly ostensible, partly politic. In outward shew, Hob came to visit his friends of the Halidome, and share the festivity common among country folks, after the barn-yard has been filled, and to renew old intimacies by new conviviality. But in very truth he also came to have an eye upon the contents of each stack, and to obtain such information respecting the extent of the crop reaped and gathered in by each feuar, as might prevent the possibility of abstracted multures.

All the world knows that the cultivators of each barony or regality, temporal or spiritual, in Scotland, are obliged to bring their corn to be grinded at the mill of the territory, for which they pay a heavy charge, called intown multures. I could speak to the thirlage of invecta et illata too, but let that pass. I have said enough to intimate that I talk not without book. Those of Sucken, or enthralled ground, were liable in penalties, if, deviating from this thirlage, (or thraldom) they carried their grain to another mill. Now such another mill, erected on the lands of a lay-baron, lay within a tempting and convenient distance of Glendearg; and the Miller was so obliging, and his charges so moderate, that it required Hob Miller's utmost vigilance to prevent evasions of his right of monopoly.

The most effectual means he could devise was this shew of good fellowship and neighbourly friendship, — under colour of which he made his annual cruise through the barony — numbered every corn-stack, and computed its contents by the boll, so that he could give a shrewd hint afterwards whether or not the grist came to the right mill.

Dame Elspeth, like her compeers, was obliged to take these domiciliary visits in the sense of politeness; but in her case they had not occurred since her husband's death, probably because the tower of Glendearg was distant, and there was but a trifling quantity of arable or in-field land attached to it. This year there had been, upon some speculation of old Martin's, several bolls sown in the outfield, which, the season being fine, had ripened remarkably well. Perhaps this circumstance occasioned the honest Miller's including Glendearg, on this occasion, in his annual round.

Dame Glendinning received with pleasure a visit which she used formerly only to endure with patience; and she had changed her view of the matter chiefly, if not entirely, because Hob had brought with him his daughter Mysie, of whose features she could give so slight an account, but whose dress she had described so accurately to the Sub-Prior.

Hitherto this girl had been an object of very trifling consideration in the eyes of the good widow; but the Sub-Prior's particular and somewhat mysterious enquiries had set her brains to work on the subject of Mysie of the Mill; and she had here asked a broad question, and there she had thrown out an inuendo, and there again she had gradually led on to a conversation on the subject of poor Mysie. And from all enquiries and investigations she had collected, that Mysie was a dark-eyed laughter-loving wench, with cherry-cheeks, and a skin as white as her father's finest bolted flour, out of which was made the Abbot's own wastel-bread. For her temper, she sung and laughed from morning to night; and for her fortune, a material article, besides that which the Miller might have amassed by means of his proverbial golden thumb, Mysie was to inherit a good handsome lump of land, with a prospect of the mill and mill-acres descending to her husband on an easy lease, if a fair word were spoken in season to the Abbot, and to the Prior, and to the Sub-Prior, and to the Sacristan, and so forth.

By turning and again turning these advantages over in her own mind, Elspeth at length came to be of opinion, that the only way to save her son Halbert from a life of „spur, spear, and snaffle,“ as they called that of the border-riders, from the dint of a clothyard shaft, or the loop of an inch-cord, was, that he should marry and settle, and that Mysie Happer should be his destined bride.

As if to her wish, Hob Miller arrived on his strong-built mare, bearing on a pillion behind him the lovely Mysie, with cheeks like a peony-rose, (if Dame Glendinning had ever seen one,) spirits all affect with rustic coquetry, and a profusion of hair as black as ebony. The beau-ideal which Dame Glendinning had been bodying forth in her imagination, became unexpectedly realized in the buxom form of Mysie Happer, whom, in the course of half an hour, she settled upon as the maiden who was to fix the restless and untutored Halbert. True, Mysie, as the dame soon saw, was like to love dancing round a may-pole as well as managing a domestic establishment, and Halbert was like to break more heads than he would grind sacks of corn. But then a miller should always be of manly make, and has been described so since the days of Chaucer and James I.* Indeed to be able to outdo and bully the whole Sucken, (once more we use this barbarous phrase,) in all athletic exercises, was one way to render easy the collection of dues which men would have disputed with a less formidable

* The verse we have chosen for a motto, is from a poem imputed to James I. of Scotland. As for the Miller who figures among the Canterbury pilgrims, besides his sword and buckler, he boasted other attributes, all of which, but especially the last, shew that he relied more on the strength of the outside than that of the inside of his skull.

The miller was a stout carl for the nones;
Full big he was of brawn, and eke of bones;
That proved well, for wherso'er he cam,
At wrastling he wold bear away the ram;
He was short-shoulder'd, broad, a thick gnar,
There n'as no door that he n'old heave of bar,
Or break it at a running with his head, etc.

champion. Then, as to the deficiencies of the miller's wife, the dame was of opinion that they might be supplied by the activity of the miller's mother. „I will keep house for the young folks myself, for the tower is grown very lonely,“ thought Dame Glendinning, „and to live near the kirk will be mair comfortable in my old age — and then Edward may agree with his brother about the feu, more especially as he is a favourite with the Sub-Prior, and then he may live in the old tower like his worthy father before him — and who kens but Mary Avenel, high-blood as she is, may e'en draw in her stool to the chimney-nook, and sit down here for good and a'? — It's true she has no tocher, but the like of her for beauty and sense ne'er crossed my een; and I have kenn'd every wench in the Hallidome of St Mary's — ay, and their mothers that bore them — ay, she is a sweet and a lovely creature as ever tied snood over brown hair — ay, and then, though her uncle keeps her out of her ain for the present time, yet it is to be thought the grey-goose-shaft will find a hole in his coat of proof, as, God help us! it has done in many a better man's — And, moreover, if they should stand on their pedigree and gentle race, Edward might say to them, that is to her gentle kith and kin, „whilk o' ye was her best friend when she came down the glen to Glendearg in a misty evening, on a beast mair like a cuddie than aught else?“ — And if they tax him with churl's blood, Edward might say, that, forbye the old proverb, how

Gentle deed

Makes gentle bleid;

yet, moreover, there comes no churl's blood from Glendinning or Brydone, for, says Edward "——

The hoarse voice of the Miller at this moment recalled the dame from her reverie, and compelled her to remember that if she meant to realize her airy castle, she must begin by laying the foundation in civility to her guest and his daughter, whom she was at that moment most strangely neglecting, though her whole plan turned on conciliating their favour and good opinion, and that, in fact, while arranging matters for so intimate a union with her company, she was suffering them to sit unnoticed, and in their riding gear, as if about to resume their journey. „And so I say, dame,“ concluded the Miller, (for she had not marked the beginning of his speech,) „an ye be so busied with your housewife-skep, or aught else, why, Mysie and I will trot our way down the glen again to Johnie Broxmouth's, who pressed us right kindly to bide with him.“

Starting at once from her dream of marriages and inter-marriages, mills, mill-lands and baronies, Dame Elspeth felt for a moment like the milk-maid in the fable, when she overset the pitcher, on the contents of which so many golden dreams were founded. But the foundation of Dame Glendinning's hopes was only tottering, not overthrown, and she hastened to restore its equilibrium. Instead of attempting to account for her absence of mind and want of attention to her guests, which she might have found something difficult, she assumed the offensive, like an able general when he finds it necessary, by a bold attack, to disguise his weakness.

A loud exclamation she made, and a passionate complaint she set up against the unkindness of her old friend, who could, for an instant doubt the heartiness of her welcome to him and to his hopeful daughter; and then to think of his going back to John Broxmouth's, when the auld tower stood where it did, and had room in it for a friend or two in the worst of times — and he too a neighbour that his unquhile gossip Simon, blessed be his cast, used to think the best friend he had in the Halidome! And on she went, urging her complaint with so much seriousness that she had well nigh imposed on herself as well as upon Hob Miller, who had no mind to take anything in dudgeon; and as it suited his plans to pass the night at Glendearg, would have been equally contented to do so even had his reception been less vehemently hospitable.

To all Elspeth's expostulations on the unkindness of his proposal to leave her dwelling, he answered composedly, „Nay, dame, what could I tell? ye might have had other grist to grind, for ye looked as if ye scarce saw us — or what know I? ye might bear in mind the words Martin and I had about the last barley ye sawed — for I ken dry multures* will sometimes stick in the throat. A man seeks but his awn, and yet folks shall hold him for both miller and miller's man, that is miller and knave, † all the country over.“

* Dry multures were a fine, or compensation in monee, for not grinding at the mill of the thirl. It was, and is, accounted a vexatious exaction.

„Alas! that you will say so, neighbour Hob,“ said Dame Elspeth, „or that Martin should have had any words with you about the mill-dues. I will chide him roundly for it, I promise you, on the faith of a true widow. You know full well that a lone woman is sore put upon by her servants.“

„Nay, dame,“ said the Miller, unbuckling the broad belt which made fast his cloak, and served, at the same time, to suspend by his side a swinging Andrew Ferrara, „bear no grudge at Martin, for I bear none — I take it on me as a thing of mine office to maintain my right of multure, lock, and goupen.* And reason good, for, as the old song says,

I live by my mill, God Bless her,
She's parent, child, and wife.

† The under miller, is in the language of thirlage called the knave, which indeed signified originally his lad, (Knabé-German,) but by degrees came to be taken in a worse sense. In the old translations of the Bible, Paul is made to term himself the knave of our Saviour. The allowance of meal taken by the miller's servant was termed knave-ship.

*The multure was the regular exactions for grinding the meal. The lock, (signifying a small quantity,) and the goupen a handful, were additional perquisites demanded by the miller, and submitted to or resisted by the Suckener as circumstances permitted. These and other petty dues were called in general the Sequels.

The poor old slut, I am beholden to her for my living, and bound to stand by her, as I say to my mill-knaves, in right and in wrong. And so should every honest fellow stand by his breadwinner.—And so, Mysie, ye may doff your cloak since our neighbour is so kindly glad to see us—why, I think, we are as blythe to see her — not one in the Halidome pays their multures more duly, sequels, arriage, and carriage, and mill-services used and wont.“

With that the Miller hung his ample cloak without further ceremony upon a huge pair of stag's antlers, which adorned at once the naked walls of the tower, and served for what we vulgarly call cloak-pins.

In the meantime, Dame Elspeth assisted to disembarrass the damsel whom she destined for her future daughter-in-law, of her hood, mantle, and the rest of her riding gear, giving her to appear as beseemed the buxom daughter of the wealthy Miller, gay and goodly, in a white kirtle, theseams of which were embroidered with green silken lace or fringe, entwined with some silver thread. An anxious glance did Elspeth cast upon the good-humoured face, which was now more fully shown to her, and was only obscured by a quantity of raven black hair, which the maid of the mill had restrained by a snood of green silk, embroidered with silver, corresponding to the trimmings of her kirtle. The countenance itself was exceedingly comely — the eyes black, large and roguishly good-humoured — the mouth was small — the lips well formed, though somewhat full — the teeth were pearly white — and the chin had a very seducing dimple in it.

The form belonging to this joyous face was full and round, and firm and fair. It might become coarse and masculine some years hence, which is the common fault of Scottish beauty; but in Mysie's sixteenth year she had the shape of an Hebe. The anxious Elspeth, with all her maternal partiality, could not help admitting within herself, that a better man than Halbert might go farther and fare worse. She looked a little giddy, and Halbert was not nineteen; still it was time he should be settled, for to that point the dame always returned; and here was an excellent opportunity.

The simple cunning of Dame Elspeth now exhausted itself in commendations of her fair guest, from the snood, as they say, to the single soled shoe. Mysie listened and blushed with pleasure for the first five minutes; but ere ten had elapsed, she began to view the old lady's compliments rather as subjects of mirth than of vanity, and was much more disposed to laugh at than to be flattered with them, for nature had mingled the good-humour with which she had endowed the damsel with no small portion of shrewdness. Even Hob himself began to tire of hearing his daughter's praises, and broke in with, „Ay, ay, she is a clever quean enough; and, were she five years older, she shall lay a loaded sack on an *aver with e'er a lass in the Halidome. But I have been looking for your two sons. Men say downbye, that Halbert's turned a wild springald, and that we may have word of him from Westmoreland one moonlight night or another"—

* Aver — properly a horse of labour

„God forbid, my good neighbour; God, in his mercy forbid!“ said Dame Glendinning earnestly; for it was touching the very key-note of her apprehensions, to hint any probability that Halbert might become one of the marauders so common in the age and country. But fearful of having betrayed too much alarm on this subject, she immediately added, „That though since the last rout at Pinky-cleuch, she had been all of a tremble when a gun or a spear was named, or when men spoke of fighting; yet, thanks to God and Our Lady, her sons were like to live and die honest and peaceful tenants to the Abbey, as their father might have done, but for that awful hosting which he went forth to, with many a brave man that never returned.“

„Ye need not tell me of it, dame,“ said the Miller, „since I was there myself, and made two pair of legs (and these were not mine, but my mare’s,) worth one pair of hands. I judged how it would be, when I saw our host break ranks with rushing on through that broken ploughed field, and so as they had made a pricker of me, I e’en pricked off with myself while the play was good.“

„Ay, ay, neighbour,“ said the dame, „ye were aye a wise and a wary man; if my Simon had had your wit, he might have been here to speak about it this day; But he was aye cracking of his good blood and his high kindred, and less would not serve him than to bide the bang to the last, with the earls, and knights, and squires, that had no wives to greet for them, or else had wives that cared not how soon they were widows; but that is not for the like of us. But touching my son Halbert, there is no fear of him; for it should be his misfortune to be in the like case, he has the best pair of heels in the Halidome, and could run almost as fast as your mare herself."

"Is this he, neighbour?" quoth the Miller.

"No," replied the mother; "that is my youngest son, Edward, who can read and write like the Lord Abbot himself, if it were not a sin to say so."

"Ay," said the Miller; "and is that the young clerk the Sub-Prior thinks so much upon? they say he will come far ben that lad; wha kens but he may come to the Sub-Prior himself? — as broken a ship has come to land."

"To be a Prior, neighbour Miller," said Edward, "a man must first be a priest, and for that I judge I have little vocation."

"He will take to the pleugh-pettle, neighbour," said the good dame; "and so will Halbert too, I trust. I wish you saw Halbert,—Edward, where is your brother?"

"Hunting, I think," replied Edward; "at least he left us this morning to join the Laird of Hunter's-hope and his hounds, I have heard them baying in the glen all day."

"And if I had heard the music," said the Miller, "it would have done my heart good, ay, and may be taken me two or three miles out of my road. When I was the Miller of Morebattle's knave, I have followed the hounds from Eckford to the foot of Hounam-law — followed them on foot, Dame Glendinning, ay, and led the chase when the Laird of Cessford and his gay riders were all thrown out by the mosses and gills. I brought the stag on my back to Hounam Cross, when the dogs had pulled him down. I think I see the old grey knight, as he sate so upright on his strong war-horse, all white with foam; and 'Miller,' said he to me, 'an thou wilt turn thy back on the mill, and wend with me, I will make a man of thee.' But I chose rather to abide by clap and happer, and the better luck was mine; for the proud Percy caused hang five of the Laird's henchmen at Alnwick for burning a rickle of houses some gate beyond Fowberry."

„Ah, neighbour, neighbour," said Dame Glendinning, „yon were aye wise and wary; but if you like hunting, I must say Halbert's the lad to please you. He hath all those fair holiday-terms of hawk and hound as ready in his mouth as Tom with the tod's-tail, that is the Lord-Abbot's ranger."

„Ranges he not homeward at dinnertime, dame," demanded the Miller; „for we call noon the dinner-hour at Kennaquhair?"

The widow was forced to admit, that even at this important period of the day, Halbert was frequently absent; at which the Miller shook his head, intimating, at the same time, some allusion to the proverb of Mac Farlane's geese, which „liked their play better than their meat."

* A brood of wild-geese, which long frequented the uppermost island in Loch-Lomond, called Inch-Tavoe, were supposed to have some mysterious connection with the ancient family of MacFarlane of that ilk, and it is said were never seen after the ruin and extinction of that house. Why they were said to like their play better than their meat, I could never learn, but the proverb is in general use. The MacFarlanes had a house and garden upon that same island of Inch-Tavoe.

That the delay of dinner might not increase the Miller's disposition to prejudge Halbert, Dame Glendinning called hastily on Mary Avenel to take her task of entertaining Mysie Happer, while she herself rushed to the kitchen, and, entering at once into the province of Tibb Tacket, rummaged among trenchers and dishes, snatched pots from the fire, and placed pans and gridirons on it, accompanying her own feats of personal activity with such a continued list of injunctions to Tibb, that Tibb at length lost patience, and said, „Here was as muckle wark about meating and auld miller, as if they had been to banquet the blood of Bruce.“ But this, as it was supposed to be spoken aside, Dame Glendinning did not think it convenient to hear.

CHAPTER II.

Nay, let me have the friends who eat my victuals,
As various as my dishes. The feast's naught,
Where one huge plate predominates.— John Plaintext,
He shall be mighty beef, our English staple;
The worthy Alderman, a butter'd dumpling;
Yon pair of whisker'd Cornets, ruff and rees;
Their friend the Dandy, a green goose in sippets.
And so the board is spread at once and fill'd
On the same principle—Variety.

New Play.

„AND what brave lass is this?“ said Hob Miller, as Mary Avenel entered the apartment to supply the absence of Dame Elspeth Glendinning.

„The young Lady of Avenel, father,“ said the Maid of the Mill, dropping as low a courtsey as her rustic manners enabled her to make. The Miller, her father, doffed his bonnet, and made his reverence, not altogether so low perhaps as if the young lady had appeared in the pride of rank and riches, yet so as to give high birth the due homage which the Scotch for a length of time scrupulously rendered to it.

Indeed, from having had her mother's example before her for so many years, and from a native sense of propriety and even of dignity. Mary Avenel had acquired a demeanour, which marked her title to consideration, and effectually checked any attempt of familiarity on the part of those who might be her associates in her present situation, but could not be well termed her equals. She was by nature mild, pensive, and contemplative, gentle in disposition, and most placable when accidentally offended; but still she was of a retired and reserved habit, and shunned to mix in ordinary sports, even when the rare occurrence of a fair or wake gave her an opportunity of mingling with companions of her own age. If at such scenes she was seen for an instant, she appeared to behold them with the composed indifference of one to whom their gaiety was a matter of no interest, and who seemed only desirous to glide away from the scene as soon as she possibly could.

Something also had transpired concerning her being born on All-hallow Eve, and the powers with which that circumstance was supposed to invest her over the invisible world. And from all these particulars combined, the young men and women of the Halidome used to distinguish Mary among themselves by the name of the Spirit of Avenel, as if the fair but fragile form, the beautiful but rather colourless cheek, the dark blue eye, and the shady hair, had belonged rather to the immaterial than the substantial world. The general tradition of the White Lady, who was supposed to wait on the fortunes of the family of Avenel, gave a sort of zest to this piece of rural wit. It gave great offence, however, to the two sons of Simon Glendinning, and when the expression was in their presence applied to the young lady, Edward was wont to check the petulance of those who used it by strength of argument, and Halbert by strength of arm. In such cases Halbert had this advantage, that although he could render no aid to his brother's argument, yet when circumstances required it in his own personal manner of taking up the affair, he was sure to have that of Edward, who never indeed himself commenced a fray, but on the other hand, did not testify any reluctance to enter into combat in Halbert's behalf or in his rescue.

But the zealous attachment of the two youths, being themselves, from the retired situation in which they dwelt, comparative strangers in the Halidome, did not serve in any degree to alter the feelings of the inhabitants towards the young lady, who seemed to have dropped amongst them from out of another sphere of life. Still, however, she was regarded with respect, if not with fondness; and the attention of the Sub-Prior to the family, not to mention the formidable name of Julian Avenel, which every new incident of these tumultuous times tended to render more famous, attached to his niece a certain importance. So that some aspired to her acquaintance out of pride, while the more timid of the feuars were anxious to inculcate upon their children, the necessity of being respectful to the noble orphan. So that Mary Avenel, little loved because little known, was regarded with a mysterious awe, partly derived from fear of her uncle's moss-troopers, and partly from her own retired and distant habits, enhanced by the superstitious opinions of the time and country.

It was not without some portion of this awe, that Mysie felt herself left alone in company with a young person so distant in rank, and so different in bearing from herself; for her worthy father had taken the first opportunity to step out unobserved, in order to mark how the barn-yard was filled, and what prospect it afforded of grist to the mill. In youth, however, there is a sort of free-masonry, which, without much conversation, teaches young persons to estimate each other's character, and places them at ease on the briefest acquaintance. It is only when taught deceit by the commerce of the world, that we learn to shroud our character from observation; and to disguise our real sentiments from those with whom we are placed in communion.

Accordingly, the two young women were soon engaged in such objects of interest as best became their age. They visited Mary Avenel's pigeons, which she nursed with the tenderness of a mother; they turned over her slender stores of finery, which yet contained some articles which excited the respect of her companion, though Mysie was too good-humoured to nourish envy. A golden rosary, and some female ornaments marking superior rank, had been rescued in the moment of their utmost adversity, more by Tibb Tacket's presence of mind, than by the care of their owner, who was at that sad moment too much sunk in deep grief to pay any attention to such circumstances. They struck Mysie with a deep impression of veneration; for excepting what the Lord Abbot and the convent might possess, she did not believe there was so much real gold in the world as was exhibited in these few trinkets; and Mary, however sage and serious, was not above being pleased with the admiration of her rustic companion.

Nothing, indeed, could exhibit a stranger contrast than the appearance of the two girls;—

the good-humoured laughterloving countenance of the Maid of the Mill, who stood gazing with unrepressed astonishment, on whatever was in her inexperienced eye rare and costly, and with a humble, and at the same time cheerful acquiescence in her inferiority, asking all the little queries about the use and value of the ornaments, while Mary Avenel, with her quiet composed dignity and placidity of manner, produced them one after another for the amusement of her companion.

As they became gradually more familiar, Mysie of the Mill was just venturing to ask, why Mary Avenel never appeared at the May-pole, and to express her wonder when the young lady said she disliked dancing, when a trampling of horses at the gate of the tower interrupted their conversation.

Mysie flew to the shot-window, in the full ardour of unrestrained female curiosity. „Saint Mary! sweet lady! here come two well-mounted gallants, will you step this way to look at them?“

„No,“ said Mary Avenel, „you shall tell me who they are.“

„Well, if you like it better,“ said Mysie — „but how shall I know them?—Stay, I do know one of them, and so do you, lady; he is a blythe man, somewhat light of hand they say, but the gallants of these days think no great harm of that. He is your uncle's henchman, that they call Christie of Clinthill; and he has not his old green jerkin, and the rusty black jack over it, but a scarlet cloak, laid down with silver lace three inches broad, and a breast plate you might see to dress your hair in, as well as in that keeking glass in the ivory frame that you shewed me even now. Come, dear lady, come to the shot-window and see him."

"If it be the man you mean, Mysie," replied the orphan of Avenel, "I will see him soon enough, considering either the pleasure or comfort the sight will give me."

"Nay, but if you will not come to see gay Christie," replied the Maid of the Mill, her face flushed with eager curiosity, "come and tell me who the gallant is that is with him, the handsomest, the very lovesomest young man I ever saw with sight."

"It is my foster-brother, Halbert Glendinning," said Mary, with apparent indifference; for she had been accustomed to call the sons of Elspeth her foster-brethren, and to live with them as if they had been her brothers in earnest.

"Nay, by Our Lady, that it is not," said Mysie; "I know the favour of both the Glendinnings well, and I think this rider be not of our country. He has a crimson velvet bonnet, and long brown hair falling down under it, and a beard on his upper lip, and his chin clean and close shaved, and a sky-blue jerkin, slashed and lined with white sattin, and trunk-hose to suit, and no weapon but a rapier and dagger — Well, if I was a man, I would never wear weapon but the rapier! it is so slender and becoming, instead of having a cartload of iron at my back, like my father's broad-sword, with its great rusty basket-hilt. Do you not delight in the rapier and poniard, lady?"

"The best sword," answered Mary, "if I must needs answer a question of the sort, is that which is drawn in the best cause, and which is best used when it is out of the scabbard.“

„But can you not guess who this stranger should be?“ said Mysie.

„Indeed, I cannot even attempt it; but to judge by his companion, it is no matter how little he is known,“ replied Mary.

„My benison on his bonny face,“ said Mysie, „if he is not going to alight here! Now, I am as much pleased as if my father had given me the silver ear-rings he has promised me so often; nay, you had as well come to the window, for you must see him by and by whether you will or not.“

„I do not know how much sooner Mary Avenel might have sought the point of observation, if she had not been scared from it by the unrestrained curiosity expressed by her buxom friend; but at length the same feeling prevailed over her sense of dignity, and satisfied with having displayed all the indifference that was necessary in point of decorum, she no longer thought it necessary to restrain her curiosity.

From the out-shot or projecting window she could perceive, that Christie of the Clinthil was attended on the present occasion by a very gay and gallant cavalier, who, from the nobleness of his countenance and manner, his rich and handsome dress, and the shewy appearance of his horse and furniture, must, she agreed with her new friend, be a person of some consequence.

Christie also seemed conscious of something, which made him call out with more than his usual insolence of manner, „What, ho! so ho! the house! Churl peasants, will no one answer when I call? — Ho! Martin, — Tibb, — Dame Glendinning! — a murrain on you, must we stand keeping our horses in the cold here, and they steaming with heat, when we have ridden so sharply?”

At length he was obeyed, and old Martin made his appearance. „Ha!“ said Christie, „art thou there, old True-penny? here, stable me these steeds, and see them well bedded, and stretch thine old limbs by rubbing them down; and see thou quit not the stable till there is not a turned hair on either of them.“

Martin took the horses to the stable as commanded, but suppressed not his indignation a moment after he could vent it with safety. „Would not any one think,“ he said to Jasper, an old ploughman, who, in coming to his assistance, had heard Christie's imperious injunctions, „that this loon, this Christie of the Clinthill, was laird or lord at the least of him? No such thing, man! I remember him a little dirty turnspit boy in the house of Avenel, that every body in a frosty morning like this warmed his fingers by kicking or cuffing! and now he is a gentleman, and swears, d—n him and renounce him, as if the gentlemen could not so much as keep their own wickedness to themselves, without the like of him going to hell in their very company, and by the same road. I have as much a mind as ever I had to my dinner, to go back and tell him to sort his horse himself, since he is as able as I am.“

„Hout tout, man!“ answered Jasper, „keep a calm sough; better to fleech a fool than fight with him.“

Martin acknowledged the truth of the pro-

verb, and, much comforted therewith, betook himself to cleaning the stranger's horse with great assiduity, remarking, it was a pleasure to handle a handsome nag, and turned over the other to the charge of Jasper. Nor was it until Christie's commands were literally complied with, that he deemed it proper, after washing himself, to join the party in the spence; not for the purpose of waiting upon them, as a mere modern reader might possibly expect, but that he might have his share of dinner in their company.

In the mean while Christie had presented his companion to Dame Glendinning as Sir Piercie Shafton, a friend of his and of his master, come to spend three or four days with little din in the tower. The good dame could not conceive how she was entitled to such an honour, and would fain have pleaded her want of every sort of convenience to entertain a guest of that quality. But, indeed, the visitor, when he cast his eyes round the bare walls, eyed the huge black chimney, scrutinized the meagre and broken furniture of the apartment, and beheld the embarrassment of the mistress of the family, intimated great reluctance to intrude upon Dame Glendinning a visit, which could scarce, from all appearances, prove otherwise than an inconvenience to her, and a penance to himself.

But the reluctant hostess and her guest had to do with an inexorable man, who silenced all expostulation with, „such was his master's pleasure. And, moreover,“ he continued, „though the Baron of Avenel's will must, and ought to prove law to all within ten miles around him, yet here, dame,“ he said, „is a letter from your petticoated baron, the lord-priest yonder, who enjoins you, as you regard his pleasure, that you afford to this good knight such decent accommodation as is in your power, suffering him to live as privately as he shall desire. And for you, Sir Piercie Shafton," continued Christie, "you will judge for yourself, whether secrecy and safety is not more your object even now, than soft beds and high cheer. And do not judge of the dame's goods by the semblance of her cottage; for you will see by the dinner she is about to spread for us, that the vassal of the kirk is seldom found with her basket bare."

While he thus laboured to reconcile Sir Piercie Shafton to his fate, the widow having consulted her son Edward on the real import of the Lord Abbot's injunction, and having found that Christie had given a true exposition, saw nothing else left for her save to make that fate as easy as she could to the stranger. He himself also seemed reconciled to his lot by some feeling probably of strong necessity, and accepted with a good grace the hospitality which the dame offered with a very indifferent one.

In fact, the dinner which soon smoked before the assembled guests, was of that substantial kind which warrants plenty and comfort. Dame Glendinning had cooked it after her best manner; and, delighted with the handsome appearance which her good cheer made when placed on the table, forgot both her plans and the vexations which interrupted them, in the hospitable duty of pressing her assembled visitors to eat and drink, watching every trencher as it waxed empty, and loading it with fresh supplies ere the guest could utter a negative.

In the meanwhile the company attentively regarded each others motions, and seemed endeavouring to form a judgment of each others character. Sir Piercie Shafton condescended to speak to no one but to Mary Avenel, and on her he conferred exactly the same familiar and compassionate, though somewhat scornful sort of attention, which a pretty fellow of these days will sometimes condescend to bestow on a country miss, when there is no prettier or more fashionable woman present. The manner indeed was different, for the etiquette of those times did not permit Sir Piercie Shafton to pick his teeth or to yawn, or to gabble like the beggar whose tongue (as he says) was cut out by the Turks, or to affect deafness or blindness, or any other infirmity of the organs. But though the embroidery of his conversation was different, the groundwork was the same, and the high-flown and ornate compliments with which the gallant knight of the sixteenth century interlarded his conversation, were as much the offspring of egotism and self-conceit, as the jargon of the coxcombs of our own days.

The English knight was, however, something daunted at finding that Mary Avenel listened with an air of indifference, and answered with wonderful brevity, to all the fine things which ought, as he conceived, to have dazzled her with their brilliancy, and puzzled her by their obscurity. But if he was disappointed in making the desired, or rather the expected impression, upon her whom he addressed, Sir Piercie Shafton's discourse was marvellous in the ears of Mysie the Miller's daughter, and not the less so that she did not comprehend the meaning of a single word which he uttered. Indeed, the gallant knight's language was far too courtly to be understood by persons of intelligence more acute than Mysie's.

It was about this time, that the „only rare poet of his time, the witty, comical, facetiously-quick, and quickly-facetious John Lyly — he that sate at Apollo's table, and to whom Phoebus gave a wreath of his own bays without snatching“* — he, in short, who wrote that singularly cox-comical work, called Euphues and his England, was in the very zenith of his absurdity and reputation. The quaint, forced, and unnatural style which he introduced by his „Anatomy of Wit,“ had a fashion as rapid as it was momentary — all the court ladies were his scholars, and to parler Euphuisme, was as necessary a qualification to a courtly gallant, as those of understanding how to use his rapier or to dance a measure.

It was no wonder that the Maid of the Mill was soon as effectually blinded by the intricacies of this erudite and courtly style of conversation, as she had ever been by the dust of her father's own meal-sacks. But there she sate with her mouth and eyes as open as the mill-door and the two windows, shewing teeth as white as her father's bolted flour, and endeavouring to secure a word or two for her own future use out of the pearls of rhetoric which Sir Piercie Shafton scattered around him with such bounteous profusion.

* Such and yet more extravagant are the compliments paid to this author by his editor Blount. Notwithstanding all exaggeration, Lyly was really a man of wit and imagination, though both were deformed by the most unnatural affectation that ever disgraced a printed page.

For the male part of the company, Edward felt ashamed of his own manner and slowness of speech, when he observed the handsome young courtier, with an ease and volubility of which he had no conception, run over all the commonplace topics of high-flown gallantry. It is true, the good sense and natural taste of young Glendinning soon informed him that the gallant cavalier was speaking nonsense. But, alas! where is the man of modest merit, and real talent, who has not suffered from being outshone in conversation, and outstripped in the race of life, by men of less reserve, and of qualities more showy, though less substantial? and well constituted must the mind be, that can yield up the prize without envy to competitors more unworthy than himself.

Edward Glendinning had no such philosophy. While he despised the jargon of the gay cavalier, he envied the facility with which he could run on, as well as the courtly grace of his tone and expression, and the perfect ease and elegance with which he offered all the little acts of politeness to which the duties of the table gave opportunity. And if I am to speak truth, I must own that he envied those qualities the more, as they were all exercised in Mary Avenel's service, and, although only so far accepted as they could not be refused, intimated a wish on the stranger's part to place himself in her good gra-ees, as the only person in the room to whom he thought it worth while to recommend himself. His title, rank, and very handsome figure, together with some sparks of wit and spirit which flashed across the cloud of nonsense which he uttered, rendered him, as the words of the old song say, „a lad for a lady's viewing;“ so that poor Edward, with all his real worth and acquired knowledge, in his home-spun doublet, blue cap, and deer-skin trowsers, looked like a clown beside the courtier, and, feeling the full inferiority, nourished no good will to him by whom he was eclipsed.

Christie, on the other hand, so soon as he had satisfied to the full a commodious appetite, by means of which persons of his profession could, like the wolf and eagle, gorge themselves with as much food at one meal as might serve them for several days, began also to feel himself more in the back ground than he liked to be. This worthy had, amongst his other good qualities, an excellent opinion of himself, and, being of a bold and forward disposition, had no mind to be thrown into the shade by any one. With that impudent familiarity which such persons mistake for graceful ease, he broke in upon the knight's finest speeches with as little remorse as he would have driven the point of his lance through a laced doublet.

Sir Piercie Shafton, a man of rank and high birth, by no means encouraged or endured this familiarity, and requited the intruder either with total neglect, or such laconic replies, as intimated a sovereign contempt for the rude spearman, who affected to converse with him upon terms of equality.

The Miller held his peace; for, as his usual conversation turned chiefly on his clapper and toll dish, he had no mind to brag of his wealth in presence of Christie of the Clinthill, or to intrude his discourse on the English cavalier.

A little specimen of the conversation may not be out of place, were it but to shew young ladies what fine things they have lost by living when Euphuism is out of fashion.

„Credit me, fairest lady,“ said the knight, „that such is the cunning of our English courtiers of the hodiernal strain, that, as they have infinitely refined upon the plain and rusticial discourse of our fathers, which, as I may say, more beseeemed the mouths of country roisterers in a May-game than that of courtly gallants in a galliard, so I hold it ineffably and unutterably improbable, that those who may succeed us in that garden of wit and courtesy shall alter or amend it. Venus delighteth but in the language of Mercury, Bucephalus will stoop to none but Alexander, no one can sound Apollo's pipe but Orpheus.“

„Valiant sir,“ said Mary, who could scarce help laughing, „we have but to rejoice in the chance which hath honoured this solitude with a glimpse of the sun of courtesy, though it rather blinds than enlightens us.“

„Pretty and quaint, fairest lady,“ answered the Euphuist. „Ah that I had with me my Anatomy of Wit — that all-to-be-unparalleled volume — that quintessence of human wit — that treasury of quaint invention — that exquisitely-plea-pleasant-to-read, and inevitably-necessary-to-remembered manual of all that is worthy to be known — which indoctrines the rude in civility, the dull in intellectuality, the heavy in jocosity, the blunt in gentility, the vulgar in nobility, and all of them in that unutterable perfection of human utterance, that eloquence which no other eloquence is sufficient to praise, that art which, when we call it by its own name of Euphuism, we bestow on it its richest panegyric “

„By Saint Mary,“ said Christie of the Clinthill, „if your worship had told me that you had left such wealth as you talk of at Prudhoe Castle, Long Dickie and I would have had them off with us if man and horse could have carried them, but you told us of no treasure I wot of, save the silver tongs for turning up your moustachios.“

The Knight treated this intruder's mistake — for certainly Christie had no idea that all these epithets which sounded so rich and splendid, were lavished upon a small quarto volume — with a stare, and then turning again to Mary Avenel, the only person whom he thought worthy to address, he proceeded in his strain of high-flown oratory. „Even thus,“ said he, „do hogs contemn the splendour of oriental pearls; even thus are the delicacies of a choice repast in vain offered to the long-eared grazer of the common, who turneth from them to devour a thistle. Surely as idle is it to pour forth the treasures of oratory before the eyes of the ignorant, and to spread the dainties of the intellectual banquet before those who are, morally and metaphysically speaking, no better than asses.“

„Sir Knight, since that is your quality,“ said Edward, „we cannot strive with you in loftiness of language; but I pray you in fair courtesy, while you honour my father's house with your presence, to spare us such vile comparisons.“

„Peace, good villagio,“ said the knight, gracefully waving his hand, „I prithee peace, kind rustic; and you, my guide, whom I may scarce call honest, let me prevail upon you to imitate the laudable taciturnity of that honest yeoman who sits as mute as a mill-post, and of that comely damsel, who seems as with her ears she drank in what she did not altogether comprehend, even as a palfrey listeneth to a lute, whereof howsoever he knoweth not the gamut“

„Marvellous fine words,“ at length said Dame Glendinning, who began to be tired of sitting so long silent, „marvellous fine words, neighbour Happer, are they not?“

„Brave words — very brave words — very exceeding pyet words,“ answered the Miller; „nevertheless, to speak my mind, a lippy of bran were worth a bushel o' them.“

„I think so too, under his worship's favour,“ answered Christie of the Clinthill. „I well remember that at the race of Morham, as we called it, near Berwick, I took a young southern fellow out of saddle with my lance, and cast him, it might be, a gad's length from his nag; and so, as he had some gold on his laced doublet, I deemed he might ha' the like on it in his pocket too, though that is a rule that does not aye hold good — So I was speaking to him of ransom, and out he comes with a handful of such terms as his honour there hath gleaned up, and craved me for mercy, as I was a true son of Mars, and such like.“

„And obtained no mercy at thy hand, I dare be sworn,“ said the knight, who deigned not to speak Euphuism excepting to the ladies.

„In truth,“ replied Christie, „I would have thrust my lance down his throat, but just then they flung open that accursed postern gate, and forth pricked old Hunsdon, and Henry Carey, and as many fellows at their heels as turned the chace northward again. So I e'en pricked Bayard with the spur and went off with the rest; for a man should ride when he may not wrestle, as they say in Tynedale.“

„Trust me,“ said the knight, again turning to Mary Avenel, „if I do not pity you, lady, who, being of noble blood, are thus in a manner compelled to abide in the cottage of the ignorant, like the precious stone in the head of a toad, or like a precious garland on the head of an ass — But soft, what gallant have we here, whose garb savoureth more of the rustic than doth his demeanour, and whose looks seem more lofty than his habit? even as“ ——

„I pray you, Sir Knight,“ said Mary, „to spare your courtly similitudes for refined ears, and give me leave to name unto you my foster-brother, Halbert Glendinning.“

„The son of the good dame of the cottage, as I opine,“ answered the English knight; „for by some such name did my guide discriminate the mistress of this mansion, which you, madam, enrich with your presence. — And yet, touching this juvenal, he hath that about him which belongeth to higher birth, for all are not black who dig coals“ — „Nor all white who are millers,“ said honest Hob, glad to get in a word, as they say, edge-ways.

Halbert, who had sustained the glance of the Englishman with some impatience, and knew not what to make of his manner and language, replied with some asperity, „Sir Knight, we have in this land of Scotland an ancient saying, „Scorn not the bush that bields you’ — you are a guest in my father’s house to shelter you from danger, if I am rightly informed by the domestics. Scoff not its homeliness or that of its inmates — ye might long have abidden at the court of England, ere we had sought your favour or cumbered you with our society. Since your fate has sent you hither amongst us, be contented with such fare and such converse as we can afford you, and scorn us not for our kindness; for the Scots wear short patience and long swords.“

All eyes were turned on Halbert while he was thus speaking, and there was a general feeling that his countenance had an expression of intelligence, and his person an air of dignity, which they had never before observed. Whether it were that the wonderful Being with whom he had so lately held communication, had bestowed on him a grace and dignity of look and bearing which he had not before, or whether the being conversant in high matters, and called to a destiny beyond that of other men, had a natural effect in giving becoming confidence to his language and manner, we pretend not to determine. But it was evident to all, that, from this day, young Halbert was an altered man; that he acted with the steadiness, promptitude, and determination which belonged to riper years, and bore himself with a manner which appertained to higher rank.

The knight took the rebuke with good humour. „By mine honour,“ he said, „thou hast reason on thy side, good juvenal — nevertheless, I spoke not as in ridicule of the rook which relieves me, but rather in your own praise, to whom, if this rook be native, thou may'st nevertheless rise from its lowliness; even as the lark, which maketh its humble nest in the furrow, ascendeth towards the sun, as well as the eagle which buildeth her eyry in the cliff.“

This high-flown discourse was interrupted by Dame Glendinning, who, with all the busy anxiety of a mother, was loading her son's trencher with food, and dinning in his ear her reproaches on account of his prolonged absence. „And see,“ she said, „that you do not one day get such a sight while you are walking about among the haunts of them that are not of our flesh and bone, as befell Mungo Murray when he slept on the greensward-ring of the Auld Kirkhill at sunset, and wakened at daybreak in the wild hills of Breadalbane. And see that when you are looking for deer, the red stag does not gaul you as it did Diccon Thorburn, who never cast the wound that he took from a buck's-horn. And see, when you go swaggering about with a long broad-sword by your side, whilk it becomes no peaceful man to do, that you dinna meet with them that have broad-sword and lance both — there are enow of rank riders in this land that neither fear God nor regard man."

Here her eye „in a fine frenzy rolling," fell full upon that of Christie of the Clinthill, and at once her fears for having given offence interrupted the current of maternal rebuke, which, like rebuke matrimonial, may be often better meant than timed. There was something of sly and watchful significance in Christie's eye, an eye grey, keen, fierce, yet wily, formed to express at once cunning and malice, which made the dame instantly conjecture she had said too much, while she saw in imagination her twelve goodly cows go lowing down the glen in a moonlight night, with half a score of Border spearmen at their heels.

Her voice, therefore, sunk from the elevated tone of maternal authority into a whimpering apologetic sort of strain, and she proceeded to say, „It is no that I have any ill thoughts of the Border riders, for Tibb Tacket there has often heard me say that I thought spear and bridle as natural to a Border-man as a pen to a priest, or a feather-fan to a lady—and have you not heard me say it, Tibb?"

Tibb shewed something less than her expected alacrity in attesting her mistress's deep respect for the freebooters of the southland hills; but, thus conjured, did at length reply, „Hout ay, mistress, I'se warrant I have heard you say something like that."

„Mother!" said Halbert, in a firm and commanding tone of voice, „what or whom is it that you fear under my father's roof? — I well hope that it harbours not a guest in whose presence you are afraid to say your pleasure to me or my brother? I am sorry I have been detained so late, being ignorant of the fair company which I should encounter on my return. — I pray you let this excuse suffice; and what satisfies you, will, I trust, be nothing less than acceptable to your guests.“

An answer calculated so justly betwixt the submission due to his parent, and the natural feeling of dignity in one who was by birth master of the mansion, excited universal satisfaction. And as Elspeth herself confessed to Tibb on the same evening, „She did not think it had been in the callant. Till that night, he took pets and passions if he was spoke to, and lap through the house like a four-year-auld at the least word of advice that was minted at him, but now he spoke as grave and as douce as the Lord Abbot himself. She kenn'd na,“ she said, „what might be the upshot of it, but it was like he was a wonderfu' callant even now.“

The party then fell asunder, the young men retiring to their apartments, the elder to their household cares. While Christie went to see his horse properly accommodated, Edward betook himself to his book, and Halbert, who was as ingenious in employing his hands as he had hitherto appeared imperfect in mental exertion, applied himself to constructing a place of concealment in the floor of his apartment by raising a plank, beneath which he resolved to deposit that copy of the Holy Scriptures which had been so strangely regained from the possession of men and spirits.

In the meanwhile, Sir Piercie Shafton sate still as a stone on the chair in which he had deposited himself, his hands folded on his breast, his legs stretched straight out before him and resting upon the heels, his eyes cast up to the ceiling as if he had meant to count every mesh of every cobweb with which the arched roof was canopied, wearing at the same time a face of as solemn and imperturbable gravity, as if his existence had depended on the accuracy of his calculation.

He could scarce be roused from his listless state of contemplative absorption so as to take some supper, a meal at which the younger females appeared not. Sir Piercie stared around twice or thrice as if he missed something: but he asked not for them, and only evinced his sense of a proper audience being wanting, by his abstraction and absence of mind, seldom speaking until he was twice addressed, and then replying, without trope or figure, in that plain English, which nobody could speak better when he had a mind.

Christie, finding himself in undisturbed possession of the conversation, indulged all who chose to listen with details of his own wild and inglorious warfare, while Dame Elspeth's curch bristled with horror, and Tibb Tacket, rejoiced to find herself once more in the company of a jack-man, listened to his tales, like Desdemona to Othello's, with undisguised delight. Meantime the two brother Glindinnings were each wrapped up in his own reflections, and only interrupted in them by the signal to move bed-ward.

CHAPTER II.

He strikes no coin 'tis true, but coins new phrases,
And vends them forth as knaves vend gilded counters,
Which wise men scorn, and fools accept in payment.

Old Play.

IN the morning Christie of the Clinthill was nowhere to be seen. As this worthy personage did seldom pique himself on sounding a trumpet before his movements, no one was surprised at his moonlight departure, though some alarm was excited lest he had not made it empty-handed. So, in the language of the national ballad,

Some ran to cupboard, and some to kist,
But nought was gone that could be mist.

All was in order, the key of the stable left above the door, and that of the iron grate in the inside of the lock. In short, the retreat had been made with scrupulous attention to the security of the garrison, and so far Christie left them nothing to complain of.

The safety of the premises was ascertained by Halbert, who, instead of catching up a gun or a cross-bow, and sallying out for the day as had been his frequent custom, now, with a gravity beyond his years, took a survey of all around the tower, and then returned to the spence, or public apartment, in which, at the early hour of seven, the morning-meal was prepared.

There he found the Euphuist in the same elegant posture of abstruse calculation which he had exhibited on the preceding evening, his arms folded in the same angle, his eye turned up to the same cobwebs, and his heels resting on the ground as before. Tired of this affectation of indolent importance, and not much flattered with his guest's persevering in it to the last, Halber, resolved at once to break the ice, being determined to know what circumstances had brought to the Tower of Glendinning a guest at once so supercilious and so silent.

„Sir Knight,“ he said with some firmness, „I have twice given you good morning, to which the absence of your mind hath, I presume, prevented you from yielding attention or from making return. This exchange of courtesy is at your pleasure — But, as what I have farther to say concerns your comfort and your motions in an especial manner, I will entreat you to give me some signs of attention, that I may be sure I am not wasting my words on a monumental image.“

At this unexpected address. Sir Piercie Shafton opened his eyes, and afforded the speaker a broad stare; but, as Halbert returned the glance without either confusion or dismay, the knight thought proper to change his posture, raise his eyes, draw in his legs, fix his eyes on young Glendinning, and assume the appearance of one who listens to what is said to him. Nay, to make his purpose more evident, he gave voice to his resolution in these words, „Speak! we do hear.“

„Sir Knight,“ said the youth, „it is the custom of this Halidome, or patrimony of St Mary’s to trouble with enquiries no guests who receive our hospitality, providing they tarry in our house only for a single revolution of the sun. We know that both criminals and debtors come hither for sanctuary, and we scorn to extort from the pilgrim, whom chance may make a guest, an avowal of the cause of his pilgrimage and penance. But when one so high above our rank as yourself, Sir Knight, and especially one to whom the possession of such pre-eminence is not indifferent, shews his determination to be our guest for a longer time, it is our usage to require to know from him whence he comes, and what is the cause of his journey?“

The English knight gaped twice or thrice before he answered, and then replied in a bantering tone, „Truly, good villagio, your question hath in it somewhat of embarrassment; for you ask me of things concerning which I am not as yet altogether determined what answer I may, find it convenient to make. Let it suffice thee, kind juvenal, that thou hast the Lord Abbot’s authority for treating me to the best of that power of thine, which, indeed, may not always so well suffice for my accomodation as either of us would desire.“

„I must have a more precise answer than this, Sir Knight,“ said the young Glendinning.

„Friend,“ said the knight, „be not outrageous. It may suit your northern manners thus to press harshly upon the secrets of thy betters, but believe me, that even as the lute, struck by an unskilful hand, doth produce discords, so“—

At this moment the door of the apartment opened, and Mary Avenel presented herself — “But who can talk of discords,” said the knight, assuming his complimentary vein and humour, „when the soul of harmony descends upon us in the presence of surpassing beauty! For even as foxes, wolves, and other animals void of sense and reason, do fly from the presence of the resplendent sun of heaven when he arises in his glory, so do strife, wrath, and all ireful passions retreat, and as it were scud away, from the face which now beams upon us, with power to compose our angry passions, illuminate our errors and difficulties, sooth our wounded minds, and lull to rest our disorderly apprehensions; for as the heat and warmth of the eye of day is to the material and physical world, so is the eye which I now bow down before to that of the intellectual microcosm.“

He concluded with a profound bow; and Mary Avenel, gazing from one to the other, and plainly seeing that something was amiss, could only say, „For heaven’s sake, what is the meaning of this?“

The newly acquired tact and intelligence of her foster-brother was as yet insufficient to enable him to give an answer. He was quite uncertain how he ought to deal with a guest, who, preserving a singularly high tone of assumed superiority and importance, seemed nevertheless so little serious in what he said, that it was quite impossible to discern with accuracy whether he was in jest or earnest.

Forming, however, the internal resolution to bring Sir Piercie Shafton to a reckoning at a more fit place and reason, he resolved to prosecute the matter no farther at present; and the entrance of his mother with the damsel of the Mill, and the return of the honest Miller from the stack-yard, where he had been numbering and calculating the probable amount of the season's grist, rendered further discussion impossible for the moment.

In the course of the calculation, it could not but strike the man of meal and grindstones, that, after the church's dues were paid, and after all which he himself could by any means deduct from the crop, still the residue which must revert to Dame Glendinning could not be less than considerable. I wot not if this led the honest Miller to nourish any plans similar to those adopted by Elspeth; but it is certain that he accepted with grateful alacrity an invitation which the dame gave to his daughter, to remain a week or two as her guest at Glendearg.

The principal persons being thus in high good humour with each other, all business gave place to the hilarity of the morning repast; and so much did Sir Piercie appear gratified by the attention which was paid to every word that he uttered by the nutbrown Mysie, that, notwithstanding his high birth and distinguished quality, he bestowed on her some of the more ordinary and second-rate tropes of his elocution.

Mary Avenel, when relieved from the awkwardness of feeling the full weight of his conversation addressed to herself, enjoyed it much more; and the good knight, encouraged by these conciliating marks of approbation from the sex, for whose sake he cultivated his oratorical talents, made speedy intimation of his purpose to be more communicative than he had shewn himself in his conversation with Halbert Glendinning, and gave them to understand, that it was in consequence of some pressing danger that he was at present their involuntary guest.

The conclusion of the breakfast was a signal for the separation of the company. The Miller went to prepare for his departure; his daughter to arrange matters for her unexpected stay; Edward was summoned to consultation by Martin concerning some agricultural matter, in which Halbert could not be brought to interest himself; the dame left the room upon her household concerns, and Mary was in the act of following her, when she suddenly recollected, that if she did so, the strange knight and Halbert must be left alone together, at the risk of another quarrel.

The maiden no sooner observed this circumstance, than she instantly returned from the door of the apartment, and, seating herself in a small stone window-seat, resolved to maintain that curb which she was sensible her presence imposed on Halbert Glendinning, of whose quick temper she had some apprehensions.

The stranger marked her motions, and, either interpreting them as inviting his society, or obedient to those laws of gallantry which permitted him not to leave a lady in silence and solitude, he instantly placed himself near to her side, and opened the conversation as follows:

„Credit me, fair lady,“ he said, addressing Mary Avenel, „it much rejoiceth me, being as I am a banished man from the delights of mine own country, that I shall find here, in this obscure and sylvan cottage of the north, a fair form and a candid soul, with whom I may explain my mutual sentiments. And let me pray you in particular, lovely lady, that, according to the universal custom now predominant in our court, the garden of superior wits, you will exchange with me some epithet whereby you may mark my devotion to your service. Be henceforward named, for example, my Protection, and let me be your Affability.“

„Our northern and country manners, Sir Knight, do not permit us to exchange epithets with those to whom we are strangers,“ replied Mary Avenel.

„Nay, but see now,“ said the knight, „how you are startled! even as the unbroken steed which swerves aside from the shaking of a handkerchief, though he must in time encounter the waving of a pennon. This courtly exchange of epithets of honour, is no more than the compliments which pass between Valour and Beauty, wherever they meet, and under whatever circumstances. Elizabeth of England herself calls Philip Sydney her Courage, and he in return calls that princess his Inspiration. Wherefore, my fair Protection, for by such epithet it shall be mine to denominate you—“

„Not without the young lady's consent, sir,“ answered Halbert; „most truly do I hope your courtly and quaint breeding will not so far prevail over the more ordinary rules of behaviour.“

„Fair tenant of an indifferent copyhold,“ replied the knight, with the same coolness and civility of mien, but in a tone somewhat more lofty than he used to the young lady, „we do not, in the southern parts, much intermingle discourse, save with those with whom we may stand of some footing of equality; and I must in all direction, remind you, that the necessity which makes us inhabitants of the same cabin, doth not place us otherwise on a level with each other.“

„By Saint Mary,“ replied young Glending, „it is my thought that it does; for plain men hold, that he who asks the shelter is indebted to him who gives it: and so far, therefore, is our rank equalized while this roof covers us both.“

„Thou art altogether deceived,“ answered Sir Piercie; „and that thou mayest fully adapt thyself to our relative condition, know that I account not myself thy guest, but that of thy master, the Lord Abbot of St Mary’s, who, for reasons best known to himself and me, chuseth to administer his hospitality to me through the means of thee, his servant and vassal, who art therefore, in good truth, as passive an instrument of my accommodation as this ill-made and rugged joint stool on which I sit, or as the wooden trencher from which I eat my coarse commons. Wherefore,“ he added, turning to Mary, „fairest mistress, or rather as I said before, most lovely Protection“* —

* There are many instances to be met with in the ancient drama of this whimsical and conceited custom of persons who formed an intimacy, distinguishing each other by some quaint epithet. In Every man out of his
Mary Avenel

Mary Avenel was about to reply to him, when the stern, fierce, and resentful expression of voice and countenance with which Halbert exclaimed, „Not the King of Scotland, did he live, Should use me thus!“ induced her to throw herself between him and the stranger, exclaiming, „For God’s sake Halbert, beware what you do!“

„Fear not, fairest Protection,“ replied Sir Piercie, with the utmost serenity, „that I can be provoked by this rustical and mistaught juvenal to do aught misbecoming your presence or mine own dignity; for as soon shall the gunner’s linstock give fire unto the icicle, as the spark of passion inflame my blood, tempered as it is to serenity by the respect due to the presence of my gracious protection.“

„You may well call her your protection, Sir Knight,“ said Halbert; „by Saint Andrew, it is the only sensible word I have heard you speak;

Humour, there is a humorous debate upon names most fit to bind the relation betwixt Sogliardo and Cavaliero Shift, which ends by adopting those of Countenance and Resolution. What is more to the point is in the speech of Hedon, a voluptuary and a courtier in Cynthia’s Revels. „You know that I call Madam Philantia my HONOUR, and she calls me her AMBITION. Now, when I meet her in the presence, anon, I will come to her and say, ‘Sweet Honour, I have hitherto contented my sense with the lilies of your hand, but uow I will taste the roses of your lip.’ To which she cannot but blushing answer, ‘Nay, now you are too ambitious;’ and then do I reply, ‘I cannot be too ambitious of honour, sweet lady.’ Wilt not be good?“ — I think there is some remnant of this foppery preserved in masonic lodges, but we may meet where her protection shall no longer afford you shelter.“

„Fairest protection,“ continued the courtier, not even honouring with a look, far less with a direct reply, the threat of the incensed Halbert, „doubt not that thy faithful Affability will be more commoved by the speech of this rudesby, than the bright and serene moon is perturbed by the baying of the cottage-cur, proud of the height of his own dung-hill, which, in his conceit, lifteth him nearer unto the majestic luminary.“

To what lengths so unsavoury a simile might have driven Halbert's indignation, is left uncertain; for at that moment Edward rushed into the apartment with the intelligence that two most important officers of the Convent, the Kitchener and Refectioner were just arrived with a sumpter-mule, loaded with provisions, announcing that the Lord Abbot, the Sub-Prior, and the Sacristan, were on their way hither. A circumstance so very extraordinary had never been recorded in the annals of St Mary's, or in the traditions of Glendearg, though there was a faint legendary report that a Lord Abbot had dined there in old days, after having been bewildered in a hunting expedition amongst the wilds which lie to the northward. But that the present Lord Abbot should have taken a voluntary journey to so wild and dreary a spot, the very Kamschatka of the Holidome, was a thing never dreamt of, and the news excited the greatest surprise in all the members of the family, saving Halbert alone.

This fiery youth was too full of the insult he had received to think of any thing as unconnected with it. „I am glad of it,“ he said; „I am glad the Abbot comes hither. I will know of him by what right this stranger is sent hither to domineer over us under our father's roof, as we were slaves and not freemen. I will tell the proud priest to his beard" —

„Alas! alas! my brother," said Edward, „think what these words may cost thee.“

„And what will, or what can they cost me," said Halbert, „that I should sacrifice my human feelings and my justifiable resentment to the fear of what the Abbot can do?“

„Our mother — our mother!" exclaimed Edward; „think if she is deprived of her home, expelled from her property, how can you amend what your rashness may ruin?“

„It is too true, by Heaven," said Halbert, striking his forehead. Then, stamping his foot against the floor to express the full energy of the passion to which he dared no longer give vent, he turned round and left the apartment.

Mary Avenel looked at the stranger knight, while she was endeavouring to frame a request that he would not report the intemperate violence of her foster-brother to the prejudice of his family, in the mind of the Abbot. But Sir Piercie, the very pink of courtesy, conjectured her meaning from her embarrassment, and waited not to be entreated.

„Credit me, fairest Protection," said he, „your Affability is less than capable of seeing or hearing, far less of reciting or re-iterating, aught of an unseemly nature which may have chanced while I enjoyed the Elysium of your presence. The winds of idle passion may indeed rudely agitate the bosom of the rude; but the heart of the courtier is polished to resist them. As the frozen lake receives not the influence of the breeze, even so—

The voice of Dame Glendinning in shrill summons, here demanded Mary Avenel's attendance, who instantly obeyed, not a little glad to escape from the compliments and similies of this court-like gallant. Nor was it apparently less a relief on his part; for no sooner was she past the threshold of the room, than he exchanged the look of formal and elaborate politeness which had accompanied each word he had uttered hitherto, for an expression of the utmost lassitude and ennui; and after indulging in one or two portentous yawns, broke forth into a soliloquy.

„What the foul fiend sent this wench hither? As if it were not sufficient plague to be harboured in a hovel that would hardly serve for a dog's-kennel in England, baited by a rude peasant-boy, and dependant on the faith of a mercenary ruffian, but I cannot even have time to muse over my own mishap, but must come aloft, frisk, fidget, and make speeches to please this pale hectic phantom, because she has gentle blood in her veins! By mine honour, setting prejudice aside, the mill-wench is the more attractive of the two— But patienza, Piercie Shafton, thou must not lose thy well-earned claim to be accounted a devout servant of the fair sex, a witty-brained, prompt, and accomplished courtier. Rather thank Heaven, Piercie Shafton, which hath sent thee a subject, wherein, without derogating from thy rank, (since the honours of the Avenel family are beyond dispute,) thou may'st find a whetstone for thy witty compliments, a strop whereon to sharpen thine acute ingine, a butt whereat to shoot the arrows of thy gallantry. For even as a Bilboa blade, the more it is rubbed the brighter and the sharper will it prove, so— But what need I waste my stock of similitudes in holding converse with myself?—Yonder comes the monkish retinue, like some half score of crows winging their way slowly up the valley—I hope a'gad; they have not forgotten my trunkmails of apparel amid the ample provision they have made for their own belly-timber—Mercy, a'gad, I were finely holped up if the vesture has miscarried among the thievish Borderers “

Stung by this reflection, he ran hastily down stairs, and caused his horse to be saddled, that he might, as soon as possible, ascertain this important point, by meeting the Lord Abbot and his retinue as they came up the glen. He had not ridden a mile before he met them advancing with the slowness and decorum which became persons of their dignity and profession. The knight failed not to greet the Lord Abbot with all the formal compliments with which men of rank at that period exchanged courtesies. He had the good fortune to find that his maills were numbered among the train of baggage which attended upon the party; and, satisfied in that particular, he turned his horse's head, and accompanied the Abbot to the tower of Glendearg.

Great, in the meanwhile, had been the turmoil of the good Dame Elspeth and her coadjutors, to prepare for the fitting reception of the Father Lord Abbot and his retinue. The Monks had indeed taken care not to trust too much to the state of her pantry; but she was not the less anxious to make such additions as might enable her to claim the thanks of her feudal lord and spiritual father, Meeting Halbert, as, with his blood on fire, he returned from his altercation with her guest, she commanded him instantly to go forth to the hill, and not to return without venison; reminding him that he was apt enough to go thither for his own pleasure, and must now do so for the credit of the house.

The Miller, who was now hastening his journey homewards, promised to send up some salmon by his own servant. Dame Elspeth, who by this time thought she had guests enough, had begun to repent of her invitation to poor Mysie, and was just considering by what means, short of giving offence, she could send off the Maid of the Mill behind her father, and adjourn all her own aerial architecture till some future opportunity, when this unexpected generosity on the part of the sir rendered any present attempt to return his daughter on his hand too highly ungracious to be thought further on. So the Miller departed alone on his homeward journey.

Dame Elspeth's sense of hospitality proved in this instance its own reward; for Mysie had dwelt too near the convent to be altogether ignorant of the noble art of cookery, which her father patronized to the extent of consuming on festival days such dainties as his daughter could prepare in emulation of the luxuries of the Abbot's kitchen. Stripping, therefore, her holiday kirtle, and adopting a dress more suitable to the occasion, the good-humoured maiden stripped her snowy arms above the elbows, and, as Elspeth acknowledged, in the language of the time and country, took „entire and aefauld part with her“ in the labours of the day; shewing unparalleled talent, and indefatigable industry, in the preparation of mortreux, blanc-manger, and heaven knows what delicacies besides, which Dame Glendinning, unassisted by her skill, dared not even have dreamt of presenting.

Leaving this able substitute in the kitchen, and regretting that Mary Avenel was so brought up, that she could entrust nothing to her care, unless it might be seeing the great chamber strewed with rushes, and ornamented with such flowers and branches as the season afforded, Dame Elspeth hastily donned her best attire, and with a beating heart presented herself at the door of her little tower, to make her obeisance to the Lord Abbot as he crossed her humble threshold. Edward stood by his mother, and felt the same palpitation, which his philosophy was at a loss to account for. He was yet to learn how long it is ere our reason learns to triumph over the force of external circumstances, and how much our feelings are affected by novelty, and blunted by use and habit.

On the present occasion, he witnessed with wonder and awe the approach of some half a score of riders, sober men upon sober palfreys, muffled in their long black garments, and only relieved by their white scapularies, shewing more like a funeral procession than aught else, and not quickening their pace beyond that which permitted easy conversation and easy digestion. The sobriety of the show was indeed somewhat enlivened by the presence of Sir Piercie Shafton, who, to shew that his skill in the manege was not inferior to his other accomplishments, kept alternately pressing and checking his gay courser, forcing him to piaffe, to caracole, to passage, and to do all the other feats of the school, to the great annoyance of the Lord Abbot, the wonted sobriety of whose palfrey became at length discomposed by the vivacity of its companion, while the dignitary kept crying out in bodily alarm, „I do pray you sir—Sir Knight—good now, Sir Piercie—Be quiet Benedict, there is a good steed — soh, poor fellow!“ and uttering all the other precatory and soothing exclamations by which a timid horseman usually bespeaks the favour of a frisky companion, or of his own unquiet nag, and concluding the bead-roll with a sincere Deo gratias so soon as he alighted in the court-yard of the tower of Glendearg.

The inhabitants unanimously knelt down to kiss the hand of the Lord Abbot, a ceremony which even the Monks were often condemned to. Good Abbot Boniface was too much fluttered by the incidents of the latter part of his journey, to go through this ceremony with much solemnity, or indeed with much patience. He kept wiping his brow with a snow-white handkerchief with one hand, while another was abandoned to the homage of his vassals! and then signing the cross with his outstretched arm, and exclaiming, „Bless ye — bless ye, my children!“ he hastened into the house and murmured not a little at the darkness and steepness of the rugged winding-stair, whereby he at length scaled the spence destined for his entertainment, and, overcome with fatigue, threw himself, I do not say into an easy chair, but into the easiest the apartment afforded.

CHAPTER III,

A courtier extraordinary, who by diet
Of meats and drinks, his temperate exercise,
Choice music, frequent bathe, his horary shifts
Of shirts and waistcoats, means to immortalize
Mortality itself, and makes the essence
Of his whole happiness the trim of court.

Magnetic Lady.

WHEN the Lord Abbot had suddenly and superciliously vanished from the eyes of his expectant vassals, the Sub-Prior made amends for the negligence of his principal, by the kind and affectionate greeting which he gave to all the members of the family, but especially to Dame Elspeth, her fosterdaughter, and her son Edward „Where,“ he even condescended to enquire, „is that naughty Nimrod, Halbert? — He hath not yet, I trust, turned, like his great prototype, his hunting-spear against man?“

„O no, an it please your reverence,“ said Dame Glendinning, „Halbert is up the glen to get some venison, or surely he would not have been absent when such a day of honour dawned upon me and mine.“

„O, to get savoury meat such as our soul loveth,“ muttered the Sub-Prior, „it has been at all times an acceptable gift. — I bid you good morrow, my good dame, as I must attend upon his lordship the Father Abbot.“

„And O, reverend sir,“ said the good widow, detaining him, „if it might be your pleasure to take part with us if there is any thing wrong; and if there is any thing wanted, to say that it is just coming, or to make some excuses your learning best knows how. Every bit of vassail and silver work have we been spoiled of since Pinkie Cleugh, when I lost poor Simon Glendinning, that was warst of a’.“

„Never mind — never fear,“ said the Sub-Prior, gently extricating his garment from the anxious grasp of Dame Elspeth, „the Refectioner has with him the Abbot’s plate and drinking cups; and I pray you to believe that whatever is short in your entertainment will be deemed amply made up in your good-will.“

So saying, he escaped from her and went into the spence, where such preparations as haste permitted were making for the noon collation of the Abbot and the English knight. Here he found the Lord Abbot, for whom a cushion, composed of all the plaids in the house, had been unable to render Simon’s huge elbow-chair a soft or comfortable place of rest.

„Benedicite!“ said Abbot Boniface, „now marry fie upon these hard benches with all my heart — they are as uneasy as the scabella of our novices. Saint Jude be with us, Sir Knight, how have you contrived to pass over the night in this dungeon? An your bed was no softer than your seat, you might as well have slept on the stone couch of Saint Pacomius. After trotting a full ten miles, a man needs a softer seat than has fallen to my hard lot“

With sympathizing faces, the Sacristan and the Refectioner ran to raise the Lord Abbot, and to adjust his seat to his mind, which was at length accomplished in some sort, although he continued alternately to bewail his fatigue, and to exult in the conscious sense of having discharged an arduous duty. „You errant cavaliers,“ said he, addressing the knight, „may now perceive that others have their travail and their toils to undergo as well as your honoured faculty. And this I will say for myself and the soldiers of Saint Mary, among whom I may be termed captain, that it is not our wont to flinch from the heat of the service, or to withdraw from the good fight. No, by Saint Mary! — no sooner did I learn that you were here, and dared not for certain reasons come to the Monastery, where with as good will, and with more convenience, we might have given you a better reception, than, striking the table with my hammer, I called a brother — Timothy, said I, let them saddle Benedict — let them saddle my black palfrey, and bid the Sub-Prior and some half score of attendants be in readiness to morrow after matins — we would ride to Glendearg. — Brother Timothy stared, thinking, I imagine, that his ears had scarce done him justice — but I repeated my commands, and said, Let the Kitchener and Refectioner go before to aid the poor vassals to whom the place belongs in making a suitable collation. So that you will consider, good Sir Piercie, our mutual incommodities, and forgive whatever you may find amiss.“

„By my faith,“ said Sir Piercie Shafton, „there is nothing to forgive — If you spiritual warriors have to submit to the grievous incommodities which your lordship narrates, it would ill become me, a sinful and secular man, to complain of a bed as hard as a board, of broth which relished as if made of burnt wool, of flesh which, in its sable and singed shape, seemed to put me on a level with Richard Coeur-de-Lion, when he eat up the head of a Moor carbonadoed, and of other viands savouring rather of the rusticity of this northern region."

„By the good saints, sir," said the Abbot, somewhat touched in point of his character for hospitality, of which he was in truth a most faithful and zealous professor, „it grieves me to the heart that you have found our vassals no better provided for your reception— Yet I crave leave to observe, that if Sir Piercie Shafton's affairs had permitted him to honour with his company our poor house of Saint Mary's, he might have had less to complain of in respect of easements."

„To give your lordship the reasons," said Sir Piercie Shafton, „why I could not at this present time approach your dwelling, or avail myself of its well-known and undoubted hospitality, craves either some delay, or," looking around him, „a limited audience."

The Lord Abbot immediately issued his mandate to the Refectioner: „Hie thee to the kitchen, brother Hilarius, and there make enquiry at our brother the Kitchener, within what time he opines that our collation may be prepared, since sin and sorrow it were, considering the hardships of this noble and gallant knight, no whit mentioning or weighing those we ourselves have endured, if we were now either to advance or retard the hour of refection beyond the time when the viands are fit to be set before us.“

Brother Hilarius parted with an eager alertness to execute the will of his superior, and returned with the assurance, that punctually at one after noon would the collation be ready.

„Before that time,“ said the accurate Refectioner, „the wafers, flammes, and pastrymeat, will scarce have had the just degree of fire, which learned pottingers prescribe as fittest for the body; and if it should be past one o'clock, were it but ten minutes, our brother the Kitchen-er opines, that the haunch of venison would suffer in spite of the skill of the little turn-broche whom he has recommended to your holiness by his praises.“

„How!“ said the Abbot, „a haunch of venison! — from whence comes that dainty? I remember not thou didst intimate its presence in thy hamper of vivers.“

„So please your holiness and lordship,“ said the Refectioner; „he is a son of the woman of the house who hath shot it and sent it in — killed but now; yet, as the animal-heat hath not left the body, the Kitchen-er undertakes it shall eat as tender as a young chicken — and this youth hath a special gift in shooting deer, and never misses the heart or the brain; so that the blood is not driven through the flesh, as happens too often with us. It is a hart of grease — your holiness has seldom seen such a haunch.“

„Silence, Brother Hilarius,“ said the Abbot, wiping his mouth; „it is not beseeming our order to talk of food so earnestly, especially as we must oft have our animal powers exhausted by fasting, and be accessible (as being ever mere mortals) to those signs of longing (he again wiped his mouth) which arise on the mention of victuals to an hungry man.—Minute down, however, the name of that youth — it is fitting merit should be rewarded, and he shall hereafter be a frater ad succurendum in the kitchen and buttery.“

„Alas! reverend Father, and my good lord,“ replied the Refectioner, „I did enquire after the youth, and I learn he is one who prefers the casque to the cowl, and the sword of the flesh to the weapons of the spirit.“

„And if it be so,“ said the Abbot, „see that thou retain him as a deputy-keeper and man-at-arms, and not as a lay brother of the Monastery — for old Tallboy, our forester; waxes dim-eyed, and hath twice spoiled a noble buck, by hitting him unwarily on the haunch. Ah! 'tis a foul fault, the abusing by evil-killing, evil-appetite, or otherwise, the good creatures indulged to us for our use. Wherefore, secure us the service of this youth, Brother Hilarius, in the way that may best suit him. — And now, Sir Piercie Shafton, since the fates have assigned us a space of well nigh an hour, ere we dare hope to enjoy more than the vapour or savour of our repast, may I pray you, of your courtesy, to tell me the cause of this visit; and, above all, to inform us, why you will not approach our more pleasant and better furnished hospitium?“

„Reverend Father, and my very good lord,“ said Sir Piercie Shafton, „it is well known to your wisdom, that there are stonewalls which have ears, and that secrecy is to be looked to in matters which concern a man's head."

The Abbot signed to his attendants, excepting the Sub-Prior, to leave the room, and then said, „Your valour, Sir Piercie, may freely unburthen yourself before our faithful friend and counsellor Father Eustace, the benefits of whose advice we may too soon lose, in as much as his merits will speedily recommend him to an higher station, in which, we trust, he may find the blessing of a friend and adviser as valuable as himself, since I may say of him, as our claustral rhyme goeth,*

„Dixit Abbas ad prioris,
Tu es homo boni moris,
Quia semper sanioris
Mihi das concilia.“

Indeed," he added, „the office of Sub-Prior is altogether beneath our dear brother; nor can we elevate him unto that of Prior, which, for certain reasons, is at present kept vacant amongst us. How be it, Father Eustace is fully possessed of my confidence, and worthy of yours, and well may it be said of him, Intravit in secretis nostris."

Sir Piercie Shafton bowed to the reverend brethren, and, heaving a sigh, as if he would have burst his steel-cuirass, he thus commenced his speech:

„Certes, reverend sirs, I may well heave such a suspiration, who have, as it were, exchan-

* The rest of this doggrel rhyme may be found in Fosbrooke's learned work on British Monachism.

ged heaven for purgatory, leaving the lightsome sphere of the royal court of England, for a remote nook in this inaccessible desert — quitting the tilt-yard, where I was ever ready among my compeers to splinter a lance, either for the love of honour, or for the honour of love, in order to couch my knightly spear against base and pilfering besognios and marauders — exchanging the lighted halls, wherein I used nimbly to pace the swift coranto, or to move with a loftier grace in the stately galliard, for this rugged and decayed dungeon of rusty-coloured stone — quitting the gay theatre, for the solitary chimney-nook of a Scottish dog-house — bartering the sounds of the soul-ravishing lute, and the love-awakening viol-de-gamba, for the discordant squeak of a northern bag-pipe — above all, exchanging the smiles of these beauties, who form a galaxy around the throne of England, for the cold courtesy of an untaught damsel, and the bewildered stare of a miller's maiden. More might I say, of the exchange of the conversation of gallant knights and gay courtiers of mine own order and capacity, whose conceits are bright and vivid as the lightning, for that of monks and churchmen — but it were discourteous to urge that topic.“

The Abbot listened to this list of complaints with great round eyes, which evinced no exact intelligence of the orator's meaning; and when the knight paused to take breath, he looked with a doubtful and enquiring eye at the Sub-Prior, not well knowing in what tone he should reply to an exordium so extraordinary. The Sub-Prior accordingly stepped in to the relief of his principal.

„We deeply sympathize with you, Sir Knight, in the several mortifications and hardships to which fate has subjected you, particularly in that which has thrown you into the society of those, who, as they were conscious they deserved not such an honour, so neither did they at all desire it. But all this goes little way to expound the cause of this train of disasters, or, in plainer words, the reason which has compelled you into a situation having so few charms for you.“

„Gentle and reverend sir,“ replied the knight, „forgive an unhappy person, who in giving a history of his miseries, dilateth upon them extremely, even as he who, having fallen from a precipice, looketh upward to measure the height from which he hath been precipitated.“

„Yea, but,“ said Father Eustace, „methinks it werè wiser in him to tell those who come to lift him up, which of his bones have been broken.“

„You, reverend sir,“ said the knight, „have, in the encounter of our wits, made a fair attaint;* whereas I may be in some sort said to have broken my staff across. Pardon me, grave sir, that I speak the language of the tilt-yard, which is doubtless strange to your reverend ears. — Ah! brave resort of the noble, the fair, and

* Attaint was a term of tilting used to express the champion's having attained his mark, or, in other words, struck his lance straight and fair against the helmet, or breast of his adversary. Whereas to break the lance across, intimated a total failure in directing the point of the weapon on the object of his aim.

the gay! — Ah! throne of love, and citadel of honour! — Ah! celestial beauties, by whose bright eyes it is graced! Never more shall Piercie Shafton advance, as the centre of your radiant glances, couch his lance, and spur his horse at the sound of the spiritstirring trumpets, nobly called the voice of war — never more shall he baffle his adversary's encounter boldly, break his spear dexterously, and ambling around the lovely circle, receive the rewards with which beauty honours chivalry!“

Here he paused, wrung his hands, looked upward, and seemed lost in contemplation of his own fallen fortunes.

„Mad, very mad,“ whispered the Abbot to the Sub-Prior; „I would we were fairly rid of him, for of a truth, I expect he will proceed from raving to mischief — Were it not better to call up the rest of the brethren?“

But the Sub-Prior knew better than his Superior how to distinguish the jargon of affectation from the ravings of insanity, and although the extremity of the knight's passion seemed altogether fantastic, yet he was not ignorant to what extravagancies the fashion of the day can conduct its votaries.

Allowing, therefore, two minutes space to permit the knight's enthusiastic feelings to exhaust themselves, he again gravely reminded him that the Lord Abbot had undertaken a journey, unwonted to his age and habits, solely to learn in what he could serve Sir Piercie Shafton — that it was altogether impossible he could do so without his receiving distinct information of the situation in which he had now sought refuge in Scotland — „The day wore on,“ he observed, looking at the window; „and if the Abbot should be obliged to return to the Monastery without obtaining the necessary intelligence, the regret might be mutual, but the inconvenience was like to be all on Sir Piercie’s own side.“

The hint was not thrown away.

„O, goddess of courtesy!“ said the knight, „can I have so far forgotten thy behests, as to make this good prelate’s ease and time a sacrifice to my vain complaints! Know, then, most worthy, and not less worshipful, that I, your poor visitor and guest, am by birth nearly bound to the Piercie of Northumberland, whose fame is so widely blown through all parts of the world where English worth hath been known. Now this present Earl of Northumberland, of whom I propose to give you the brief history“ —

„It is altogether unnecessary,“ said the Abbot; „we know him well to be a good and true nobleman, and a sworn upholder of our Catholic faith, in the spite of the heretical woman who now sits upon the throne of England. And it is specially as his kinsman, and as knowing that ye partake with him in such devout and faithful belief and adherence to our holy mother church, that we say to you, Sir Piercie Shafton, that ye be heartily welcome to us, and that as we wist how, we would labour to do you good service in your extremity.“

„For such kind offer, I rest your most humble debtor,“ said Sir Piercie; „nor need I at this moment say more than that my Right Honourable Cousin of Northumberland, having devised with me and some others the choise and picked spirits of the age, how and by what means the worship of God, according to the Catholic church, might be again introduced into this distracted kingdom of England, (even as one deviseth, by the assistance of his friend, to catch and to bridle a run-away steed,) it pleased him so deeply to entrust me in those communications, that my personal safety becomes as it were entwined or complicated therewith. Natheless, as we have had sudden reason to believe, this Princess Elizabeth, who maintaineth around her a sort of counsellors skilful in tracking whatever schemes may be pursued for bringing her title into challenge, or for erecting again the discipline of the Catholic church, has obtained certain knowledge of the trains which we had laid before we could give fire unto them. Wherefore, my Right Honourable Cousin of Northumberland, thinking it best belike that one man should take both blame and shame for the whole, did lay the burthen of all this trafficking upon my back; which load I am the rather content to bear, in that he hath always shewn himself my kind and honourable kinsman, as well as that my estate, I wot not how, hath of late been somewhat insufficient to maintain the expence of those braveries, where-with it is incumbent on us, who are chosen and selected spirits, to distinguish ourselves from the vulgar.“

„So that possibly,“ said the Sub-Prior, „your private affairs rendered a foreign journey less inconvenient to you than it might have been to the noble earl, your right worthy cousin.“

„You are right, reverend sir,“ answered the courtier; „rem acu — you have touched the point with a needle — My cost and expences had been indeed somewhat lavish at the late triumphs and tourneys, and the flat-capp'd citizens had shewn themselves unwilling to furnish my pocket for new gallantries for the honour of the nation, as well as for mine own peculiar glory — and, to speak truth, it was in some part the hope of seeing these matters amended that led me to desire a new world in England.“

„So that the miscarriage of your public enterprize, with the derangement of your own private affairs,“ said the Sub-Prior, „have induced you to seek Scotland as a place of refuge.“

„Rem acu, once again,“ said Sir Piercie; „and not without good cause, since my neck, if I remained, might have been brought within the circumstances of an halter — and so speedy was my journey northward, that I had but time to exchange my peach-coloured doublet of Genoa velvet, thickly laid over with goldsmith's work, for this cuirass, which was made by Bonamico of Milan, and travelled northward with all speed, judging that I might do well to visit my Right Honourable Cousin of Northumberland at one of his numerous castles. But as I posted towards Alnwick, even with the speed of a star, which, darting from its native sphere, shoots wildly downwards, I was met at Northallerton by one Henry Vaughan, a servant of my right honourable kinsman, who shewed me, that as then I might not with safety come to his presence, seeing that in obedience to orders from his court, he was obliged to issue out letters for my incarceration.“

„This,“ said the Abbot, „seems but hard measure on the part of your honourable kinsman.“

„It might be so judged, my lord,“ replied Sir Piercie; „nevertheless I will stand to the death for the honour of my Right Honourable Cousin of Northumberland. Also, Henry Vaughan gave me, from my said cousin, a good horse, and a purse of gold, with two Border-prickers as they are called, for my guides, who conducted me, by such roads and bye-paths as have never been seen since the days of Sir Lancelot and Sir Tristrem, into this kingdom of Scotland, and to the house of a certain baron, or one who holds the style of such, called Julian Avenel, with whom I found such reception as the place and party could afford.“

„And that,“ said the Abbot, „must have been right wretched; for, to judge from the appetite which Julian sheweth when abroad, he hath not, I judge, over-abundant provision at home.“

„You are right, sir — your reverence is in the right — we had but lenten fare, and, what was worse, a score to clear at the departure; for though this Julian Avenel called us to no reckoning, yet he did so extravagantly admire the fashion of my poniard — the poignet being of silver exquisitely hatched, and indeed the weapon being altogether a piece of exceeding rare device and beauty — that in faith I could not for very shame's sake but pray his acceptance of it, words which he gave me not the trouble of repeating twice, before he had stuck it into his greasy buff-belt, where, credit me, reverend sir, it shewed more like a butcher's knife than a gentleman's dagger.“

„So goodly a gift might at least have purchased you a few days hospitality,“ said Father Eustace.

„Reverend sir,“ said Sir Piercie, „had I abidden with him, I should have been complimented out of every remnant of my wardrobe— actually flayed, by the hospitable gods I swear it! Sir, he secured my spare doublet, and had a pluck at my gallygaskins — I was enforced to beat a retreat before I was altogether unrigged. In good time I received a letter from my right honourable cousin, shewing me that he had written to you in my behalf, and sent to your charge two mails filled with wearing apparel — namely, my rich crimson silk doublet, slashed out and lined with cloth of gold, which I wore at the last revels, with baldric and trimmings to correspond — also two pair black silk slops, with hanging garters of carnation silk — also the flesh-coloured silken doublet, with the trimmings of fur, in which I danced the salvage man at the Gray’s-Inn mummerly — also “ —

„Sir Knight,“ said the Sub-Prior, „I pray you to spare the further inventory of your wardrobe. The Monks of Saint Mary’s are no free-booting barons, and whatever part of your vestments have arrived at our house, have been this day faithfully brought hither, with the mails which contained them. I may presume from what has been said, as we have indeed been given to understand by the Earl of Northumberland, that your desire is to remain for the present as unknown and as unnoticed, as may be consistent with your high worth and distinction?“

„Alas, reverend father!“ replied the courtier,

„a blade when it is in the scabbard cannot give lustre, a diamond when it is in the casket cannot give light, and worth, when it is compelled by circumstances to obscure itself, cannot draw observation — my retreat can only attract the admiration of those few to whom circumstances permit its displaying itself.“

„I conceive now, my venerable father and lord,“ said the Sub-Prior, „that your wisdom will assign such a course of conduct to this noble knight, as may be alike consistent with his safety, and with the weal of the community. For you wot well, that perilous strides have been made in these audacious days, to the destruction of all ecclesiastical foundations, and that our holy community has been repeatedly menaced. Hitherto they have found no flaw in our raiment; but a party friendly as well to the Queen of England, as to the heretical doctrines of the schismatical church, or even to worse and wilder forms of heresy, prevails now at the court of our sovereign, who dare not yield to her suffering clergy the protection she would gladly extend to them.“

„My lord, and reverend sir,“ said the knight, „I will gladly relieve ye of my presence while ye canvass this matter at your freedom; and to speak truly, I am desirous to see in what case the chamberlain of my noble kinsman hath found my wardrobe, and how he hath packed the same, and whether it has suffered from the journey — there are four suits of as pure and elegant device as ever the fancy of a fair lady doated upon, every one having a treble and appropriate change of ribbons, trimmings, and fringes, which, in case of need, may as it were renew each of them, and multiply the four into twelve. — There is also my sad-coloured riding-suit, and three cut-work shirts with falling bands — I pray you, pardon me — I must needs see how matters stand with them without farther dallying.“

Thus speaking, he left the room; and the Sub-Prior, looking after him significantly, added, „Where the treasure is will the heart be also.“

„Saint Mary preserve our wits!“ said the Abbot, stunned with the knight's abundance of words; „were man's brains ever so stuffed with silk and broad-cloth, cutwork, and I wot not what besides! And what could move the Earl of Northumberland to assume for his bosom counsellor, in matters of depth and danger, such a featherbrained coxcomb as this!“

„Had he been other than what he is, venerable father,“ said the Sub-Prior, „he had been less fitted for the part of scapegoat, to which his right honourable cousin had probably destined him from the commencement, in case of their plot failing. I know something of this Piercie Shafton. The legitimacy of his mother's descent from the Piercie family, the point on which he is most jealous, hath been called in question. If hair-brained courage, and an outrageous spirit of gallantry, can make good his pretensions to the high lineage he claims, these qualities have never been denied him. For the rest, he is one of the ruffling gallants of the time, like Rowland Yorke, Stukely, and others, who wear out their fortunes, and endanger their lives, in idle braveries, in order that they may be the only choice gallants of the time; and afterwards endeavour to repair their estate, by engaging in the desperate plots and conspiracies which wiser heads have devised. To use one of his own conceited similitudes, such courageous fools resemble hawks, which the wiser conspirator keeps hooded and blindfolded on his wrist until the quarry is on the wing, and who are then flown at them."

„Saint Mary," said the Abbot, „he were an evil guest to introduce into our quiet household. Our young monks make bustle enough, and more than is beeseeming God's servants, about their outward attire already — this knight were enough to turn their brains, from the Vestiarius down to the very scullion boy."

„A worse evil might follow," said the Sub-Prior: „In these bad days, the patrimony of the church is bought and sold, forfeited and distrained, as if it were the unhallowed soil appertaining to a secular baron. Think what penalty awaits us, were we convicted of harbouring a rebell to her whom they call the Queen of England! There would neither be wanting Scottish parasites to beg the lands of the foundation, nor an army from England to burn and harry the Halidome. The men of Scotland were once Scotsmen, firm and united in their love of their country, and throwing every other consideration aside when the frontier was menaced — now they are — what shall I call them — the one part French, the other part English, considering their dear native country merely as a prize-fighting stage, upon which foreigners are welcome to decide their quarrels."

„Benedicite,“ replied the Abbot, „they are indeed slippery and evil times.“

„And therefore,“ said Father Eustace, „we must walk warily — we must not, for example, bring this man — this Sir Piercie Shafton, to our house of Saint Mary’s.“

„But how then shall we dispose of him?“ replied the Abbot; „bethink thee that he is a sufferer for holy Church’s sake — that his patron, the Earl of Northumberland, hath been our friend, and that, lying so near us, he may work us weal or woe according as we deal with his kinsman.“

„And, accordingly,“ said the Sub-Prior, „for these reasons, as well as for discharge of the great duty of Christian charity, I would protect and relieve this man. Let him not go back to Julian Avenel — this unconscientious baron would not stick to plunder the exiled stranger — Let him remain here — the spot is secluded, and if the accommodation be beneath his quality, discovery will become the less likely. We will make such means for his convenience as we can devise.“

„Will he be persuaded, thinkest thou?“ said the Abbot; „I will leave my own travelling bed for his repose, and send up a suitable easy-chair.“

„With such easements,“ said the Sub-Prior, „he must not complain; and then if threatened by any sudden danger, he can soon come down to the sanctuary, where we will harbour him in secret until means can be devised of dismissing him in safety.“

„Were we not better,“ said the Abbot,

„send him on to the court, and get rid of him at once?“

„Ay, but at the expence of our friends — this butterfly may fold his wings, and lie under cover in the cold air of Glendearg; but were he at Holyrood, he would, did his life depend on it, expand his spangled drapery in the eyes of the queen and court — Rather than fail of distinction, he would sue for love to our gracious sovereign — the eyes of all men would be upon him in the course of three short days, and the international peace of the two ends of the island endangered for a creature, who, like a silly moth, cannot abstain from fluttering round a light.“

„Thou hast prevailed with me, Father Eustace,“ said the Abbot, „and it will go hard but I improve on thy plan — I will send up in secret, not only household stuff, but wine and wassell-bread. There is a young swankie here who shoots venison well. I will give him directions to see that the knight lacks none.“

„Whatever accommodation he can have, which infers not a risk of discovery,“ said the Sub-Prior, „it is our duty to afford him.“

„Nay,“ said the Abbot, „we will do more, and will instantly dispatch a servant express to the keeper of our revestiary to send us such things as he may want, even this night. See it done, good father.“

„I will,“ answered Father Eustace; „but I hear the gull clamorous for some one to truss his points.* He will be fortunate if he lights on any

* The points were the strings of cord or ribbon, one here, who can do him the office of groom of the chamber.“

„I would he would appear,“ said the Abbot, „for here comes the Refectioner with the collation — By my faith, the ride hath given me a sharp appetite.“

CHAPTER IV.

I'll seek for other aid—Spirits, they say,
Flit round invisible, as thick as motes
Dance in the sunbeam. If that spell
Or necromancer's sigil can compel them,
They shall hold council with me,

JAMES DUFF,

THE readers attention must be recalled to Halbert Glendinning, who had left the tower of Glendearg immediately after his quarrel with its new guest Sir Piercie Shafton. As he walked with a rapid pace up the glen, old Martin followed him, beseeching him to be less hasty.

„Halbert,“ said the old man, „you will never live to have white hair, if you take fire thus at every spark of provocation.“

„And why should I wish it, old man,“ said Halbert, „if I am to be the butt that every fool may

(so called, because pointed with metal like the laces of women's stays), which attached the doublet to the hose. They were very numerous, and required assistance to tie them properly, which was called trussing.

aim a shaft of scorn against?—What avails it, old man, that you yourself move, sleep and wake, eat thy niggard meal, and repose on thy hard pallet?—Why art thou so well pleased that the morning should call thee up to daily toil, and the evening again lay thee down a wearied-out wretch? Were it not better sleep and wake no more, than to undergo this dull exchange of labour for insensibility, and of insensibility for labour?“

„God help me,“ answered Martin, „there may be truth in what thou sayest — but walk slower, for my old limbs cannot keep pace with your young legs — walk slower, and I will tell you why age, though unlovely, is yet endurable.“

„Speak on then,“ said Halbert, slackening his pace; „but remember we must seek venison to refresh the fatigues of these holymen, who will this morning have achieved a journey of six miles; and if we reach not the Brocksburn head, we are scarce like to see an antler.“

„Then know, my good Halbert,“ said Martin, „whom I love as my own son, that I am satisfied to live till death calls me, because my Maker wills it. Aye, and although I spend what men call a hard life, pinched with cold in winter, and burnt with heat in summer, though I feed hard and sleep hard, and am held mean and despised, yet I bethink me, that were I of no use on the face of this fair creation, God would withdraw me from it.“

„Thou poor old man,“ said Halbert, „and can such a vain conceit as this of thy fancied use, reconcile thee to a world where thou playest so poor a part?“

„My part was nearly as poor," said Martin, „my person nearly as much despised, the day that I saved my mistress and her child from perishing in the wilderness."

„Right Martin," answered Halbert; „there, indeed, thou didst what might be a sufficient apology for a whole life of insignificance."

„And do you account it for nothing, Halbert, that I should have the power of giving you a lesson of patience and submission to the destinies of providence? Methinks there is use for the grey hairs on the old scalp, were it but to instruct the green head by precept and by example."

Halbert held down his face, and remained silent for a minute or two, and then resumed his discourse: „Martin, see'st thou aught changed in me of late?"

„Surely," said Martin. „I have always known you hasty, wild, and inconsiderate, rude, and prompt to speak at the volley and without reflection; but now, methinks, your bearing, without losing its natural fire, has something in it of force and dignity which it had not before. It seems as if you had fallen asleep a carle, and awakened a gentleman."

„Thou canst judge, then, of noble bearing?" said Halbert.

„Surely," answered Martin, „in some sort I can; for I have travelled through court, and camp, and city, with my master, Walter Avenel, although he could do nothing for me but give me room for two score of sheep on the hill—and surely even now, while I speak with you, I feel sensible that my language is more refined than it is my wont to use, and that—though I know not the reason—the rude northern dialect, so familiar to my tongue, has given place to a more town-bred speech.“

„And this change in thyself and me, thou can'st by no means account for?“

„Change!“ replied Martin, „by Our Lady, it is not so much a change which I feel, as a recalling and renewing sentiments and expressions which I had some thirty years since, ere Tibb and I set up our humble household. It is singular, that your society should have this sort of influence over me, Halbert, and that I should never have experienced it ere now.“

„Think'st thou,“ said Halbert, „thou seest in me aught that can raise me from this base, low, despised state, into one where I may rank with those proud men, who now despise my clownish poverty?“

Martin paused an instant, and then answered, „Doubtless you may, Halbert; as broken a ship has come to land, Heard ye never of Hughie Dun, who left this Halidome, some thirty-five years gone by? A deliverly fellow was Hughie—could read and write like a priest, and could wield brand and buckler with the best of the riders. I mind him—the like of him was never seen in the Halidome of Saint Mary's, and so was seen of the preferment that God sent him.“

„And what was that?“ said Halbert, his eyes sparkling with eagerness.

„Nothing less,“ answered Martin, „than body-servant to the Archbishop of Saint Andrews!“

Halbert's countenance fell.—“A servant—and to a priest? Was this all that knowledge and activity could raise him to?"

Martin, in his turn, looked with wistful surprise in the face of his young friend. „And to what could fortune lead him farther?" answered he. „The son of a kirkfeuar is not the stuff that lords and knights are made of. Courage and scholar-craft cannot change churl's blood into gentle blood, I trow. I have heard, forbye, that Hughie Dun left a good five hundred pounds of Scot money to his only daughter, and that she married the Bailie of Pittenweem."

At this moment, and while Halbert was embarrassed with devising a suitable answer, a deer bounded across their path. In an instant the cross-bow was at the youth's shoulder, the bolt whistled, and the deer, after giving one bound upright, dropt dead on the green sward.

„There lies the venison our dame wanted," said Martin: „who could have thought of an out-lying stag being so low down the glen at this season?— And it is a hart of grease too, in full season, and three inches of fat on the brisket. Now this is all your luck, Halbert, that follows you, go where you like. Were you to put in for it, I would warrant you were made one of the Abbot's yeomen-prickers, and ride about in a purple doublet as bold as the best."

„Tush, man," answered Halbert, „I will serve the Queen, or no one. Take thou care to have down the venison to the Tower, since they expect it. I will on to the moss. I have two or three bird-bolts at my girdle, and it may be I shall find wildfowl."

He hastened his pace, and was soon out of sight. Martin paused for a moment, and looked after him. „There goes the making of a right gallant stripling, an' ambition have not the spoiling of him — Serve the Queen! said he. By my faith, and she hath worse servants, from all that I e'er heard of him. And wherefore should he not keep a high head? They that ettle to the top of the ladder will at least get up some rounds. They that mint* at a gown of gold, will always get a sleeve of it. But come, sir, (addressing the stag) you shall go to Glendearg on my two legs somewhat more slowly than you were frisking it even now on your own four nimble shanks. Nay by my faith, if you be so heavy, I will content me with the best of you, and that's the haunch and the nombles, and e'en heave up the rest on the old oak-tree yonder, and come for it with one of the yauds.“

While Martin returned to Glendearg with the venison, Halbert persecuted his walk, breathing more easily since he was free of his companion. „The domestic of a proud and lazy priest—body-squire to the Archbishop of Saint Andrews,“ he repeated to himself; „and this, with the privilege of allying his blood with the Bailie of Pittenweem, is thought a preferment worth a brave man struggling for; — nay more, a preferment which, if allowed, should crown the hopes, past, present, and to come, of the son of a kirk-vassal! By Heaven, but that I find in me a reluctance to practice their acts of nocturnal rapine,

* Mint — aim at.

 Yauds—horses; more particularly horses of labour.

I would rather take the jack and lance, and join with the Border-riders— Something I will do. Here, degraded and dishonoured, I will not live the scorn of each whiffling stranger from the South, because, forsooth, he wears tinkling spurs on a tawny boot. This thing—this phantom, be it what it will, I will see it once more. Since I spoke with her, and touched her hand, thoughts and feelings have dawned on me, of which my former life had not even dreamed; but shall I, who feel my father's glen too narrow for my expanding spirit, brook to be bearded in it by this vain gew-gaw of a courtier, and in the sight too of Mary Avenel? I will not stoop to it, by Heaven!

As he spoke thus, he arrived in the sequestered glen of Corrinan-shian, as it verged upon the hour of noon. A few moments he remained looking upon the fountain, and doubting in his own mind with what countenance the White Lady might receive him. She had not indeed expressly forbidden his again evoking her; but yet there was something like such a prohibition implied in the farewell, which recommended him to wait for another guide.

Halbert Glendinning did not long, however, allow himself to pause. Hardihood was the natural characteristic of his mind; and under the expansion and modification which his feelings had lately undergone, it had been augmented rather than diminished. He drew his sword, undid the buskin from his foot, bowed three times with deliberation towards the fountain, and as often towards the tree, and repeated the same rhyme as formerly,—

„Thrice to the holly-brake—
Thrice to the well:—
I bid thee awake,
White Maid of Avenel.
Noon gleams on the lake—
Noon glows on the fell—
Wake thee, o wake,
White Maid of Avenel.“

His eye was on the holly-bush as he spoke the last line; and it was not without an involuntary shuddering that he saw the air betwixt his eye and that object become more dim, and condense as it were into the faint appearance of a form, through which, however, so thin and transparent was the first appearance of the phantom, he could discern the outline of the bush, as through a veil of fine crape. But, gradually, it darkened into a more substantial appearance, and the White Lady stood before him with displeasure on her brow. She spoke, and her speech was still song, or rather measured chaunt; but, as if now more familiar, it flowed occasionally in modulated blank-verse, and at other times in the lyrical measure which she had used at their former meeting.

„This is the day when the fairy kind
Sit weeping alone for their hopeless lot,
And the wood-maiden sighs to the sighing wind,
And the mer-maiden weeps in her crystal grot;
For this is the day that a deed was wrought,
In which we have neither part nor share,
For the children of clay was salvation bought,
But not for the forms of sea or air!

And ever the mortal is most forlorn;
Who meeteth our race on the Friday morn,"

„Spirit," said Halbert Glendinning, boldly, „it is bootless to threaten one who holds his life at no rate. Thine anger can but slay; nor do I think thy power extendeth, or thy will stretcheth, so far. The terrors which your race produce upon others, are vain against me. My heart is hardened against fear, as by a sense of despair. If I am, as thy words infer, of a race more peculiarly the care of Heaven than thine, it is mine to call, and must be thine to answer. I am the nobler being "

As he spoke the figure looked upon him with a fierce and ireful countenance, which, without losing the resemblance of that which it usually exhibited, had a wilder and more exaggerated cast of features. The eyes seemed to contract and become more fiery, and slight convulsions passed over the face, as if it was about to be transformed into something hideous. The whole appearance resembled those faces which the imagination summons up when it is disturbed by laudanum, but which do not remain under its command, and, beautiful in their first appearance, become wild and grotesque ere we can arrest them.

But when Halbert had concluded his bold speech, the White Lady stood before him with the same pale, fixed, and melancholy aspect, which she usually bore. He had expected the agitation which she exhibited would conclude in some frightful metamorphosis. Folding her arms on her bosom, the phantom replied, „Daring youth! for thee it is well,

Here calling me in haunted dell,
That thy heart has not quail'd,
Nor thy courage fail'd,
And that thou could'st brook
The angry look
Of Her of Avenel.
Did one limb shiver,
Or an eye-lid quiver,
Thou wert lost for ever.
Though I am form'd from the ether blue,
And my blood is of the unfallen dew,
And thou art framed of mud and dust,
'Tis thine to speak, reply I must.“

„I demand of thee, then,“ said the youth, „by what charm it is that I am thus altered in mind and in wishes — that I think no longer of deer or dog, of bow or bolt — that my soul spurns the bounds of this obscure glen — that my blood boils at an insult from one by whose stirrup I would some days since have run for a whole summer's morn, contended and honoured by the notice of a single word? Why do I now seek to mate me with princes and knights and nobles?—Am I the same, who but yesterday, as it were, slumbered in contented obscurity, but who am to-day awakened to glory and ambition?
—Speak — tell me, if thou canst, the meaning of this change?—Am I spell-bound — or have I till now been under the influence of a spell, that I feel as another being, yet am conscious of remaining the same? Speak, and tell me, is it to thy influence that the change is owing?“

The White Lady replied:

„A mightier wizard far than I
Wields o'er the universe his power;
Him owns the eagle in the sky,
The turtle in the bower,
Changeful in shape, yet mightiest still,
He wields the heart of man at will,
From ill to good, from good to ill,
In cot and castle-tower.“

„Speak not thus darkly,“ said the youth, colouring so deeply, that face, neck, and hands were in a sanguine glow; „make me sensible of thy purpose.“

The spirit answered,

„Ask thy heart, whose secret cell
Is fill'd with Mary Avenel!
Ask thy pride, why scornful look
In Mary's view it will not brook?
Ask it, why thou seek'st to rise
Among the mighty and the wise,—
Why thou spurn'st thy lowly lot,—
Why thy pastimes are forgot,—
Why thou would'st in bloody strife
Mend thy luck or lose thy life?
Ask thy heart, and it shall tell,
Sighing from its secret cell,
'Tis for Mary Avenel.“

„Tell me, then,“ said Halbert, his cheek still deeply crimsoned, „thou who hast said to me that which I dared not to say to myself, by what means shall I urge my passion—by what means make it known?

The White Lady replied,—

„Do not ask me;
On doubts like these thou can'st not task me,
We only see the passing show
Of human passions' ebb and flow;
And view the pageant's idle glance
As mortals eye the northern dance,
When thousand streamers, flashing bright,
Career it o'er the brow of night,
And gazers mark their changeful gleams,
But feel no influence from their beams.“

„Yet thine own fate,“ replied Halbert, „unless men greatly err, is linked with that of mortals?“
The phantom answered,—

„By ties mysterious linked, our fated race
Holds strange connection with the sons of men,
The star that rose upon the House of Avenel,
When Norman Ulric first assumed the name,
That star, when culminating in its orbit,
Shot from its sphere a drop of diamond dew,
And this bright font received it—and a Spirit
Rose from the fountain, and her date of life
Hath co-existence with the House of Avenel,
And with the star that rules it.“

„Speak yet more plainly,“ answered young Glendinning; of this I can understand nothing. Say, what hath forged thy wierded* link of destiny with the house of Avenel? Say, especially, what fate now overhangs that house?"

* Wierded—fated.

The White Lady replied,—

„Look on my girdle—on this thread of gold—
'Tis fine as web of lightest gossamer,
And, but there is a spell on't, would not bind,
Light as they are, the folds of my thin robe.
But when 'twas donn'd, it was a massive chain,
Such as might bind the champion of the Jews,
Even when his locks were longest—it hath dwindled,
Hath minished in its substance and its strength,
As sunk the greatness of the House of Avenel.
When this frail thread gives way, I to the elements
Resign the principles of life they lent me.
Ask me no more of this!—the stars forbid it.“

„Then can'st thou read the stars,“ answered the youth, „and may'st tell me the fate of my passion, if thou can'st not aid it?“

The White Lady again replied,—

„Dim burns the once bright star of Avenel,
Dim as the beacon when the morn is nigh,
And the o'er-wearied warder leaves the light-house;
There is an influence sorrowful and fearful,
That dogs its downward course. Disastrous passion,
Fierce hate and rivalry, are in the aspect
That lowers upon its fortunes.“

„And rivalry?“ repeated Glendinning; it is then as I feared! — But shall that English silkworm presume to beard me in my father's house, and in the presence of Mary Avenel? — Give me to meet him, spirit—give me to do away the vain distinction of rank on which he refuses me the combat. Place us on equal terms, and gleam the stars with what aspect they will, the sword of my father shall controul their influences.“

She answered as promptly as before,

„Complain not on me, child of clay,
If to thy harm I yield the way.
We, who soar thy sphere above,
Know not aught of hate or love;
As will or wisdom rules thy mood,
My gifts to evil turn or good.“

„Give me to redeem my honour,“ said Halbert Glendinning — „give me to retort on my proud rival the insults he has thrown on me, and let the rest fare as it will. If I cannot revenge my wrong, I shall sleep quiet, and know nought of my disgrace.“

The phantom failed not to reply,

„When Piercie Shafton boasted high,
Let this token meet his eye.
The sun is westering from the dell.
Thy wish is granted—fare thee well!“

As the White Lady spoke or sung these last words, she undid from her locks a silver bodkin around which they were twisted, and gave it to Halbert Glendinning, then shaking her dishevelled hair till it fell like a veil around her, the outlines of her form gradually became as diffuse as her flowing tresses, her countenance grew pale as the moon in her first quarter, her features became indistinguishable, and she melted into the air.

Habit inures us to wonders; but the youth did not find himself alone by the fountain without experiencing, though in a much less degree, the revolution of spirits which he had felt upon the phantom's former disappearance. A doubt strongly pressed upon his mind, whether it were safe to avail himself of the gifts of a spirit which did not even pretend to belong to the class of angels, and might, for aught he knew, have a much worse lineage than that which she was pleased to avow. „I will speak of it,“ he said, „to Edward, who is clerkly learned, and will tell me what I should do. And yet, no—Edward is scrupulous and wary.—I will prove the effect of her gift on Sir Piercie Shafton if he again braves me, and by the issue, I will be myself a sufficient judge whether there is danger in resorting to her counsel. Home, then, home—and we shall soon learn whether that home shall longer hold me; for not again will I brook insult, with my father's sword by my side, and Mary for the spectator of my disgrace.“

CHAPTER V.

I give thee eighteen pence a-day,
And my bow shalt thou bear,
And over all the north country,
I make thee the chief rydere,
And I thirtepenne a-day, quoth the queen,
By god and by my faye,
Come fetch thy payment when thou wilt,
No man shall say thee nay.

William of Cloudesley.

THE manners of the age did not permit the inhabitants of Glendearg to partake of the collation which was placed in the spence of that ancient tower, before the Lord Abbot and his attendants, and Sir Piercie Shafton. Dame Glendinning was excluded, both by inferiority of rank and by sex; for, (though it was rule often neglected,) the Superior of Saint Mary's was debarred from taking his meals in female society. To Mary Avenel the latter, and to Edward Glendinning the former, incapacity attached; but it pleased his lordship to require their presence in the apartment, and to say sundry kind words to them upon the ready and hospitable reception which they had afforded him.

The smoking haunch now stood upon the table; a napkin, white as snow, was, with due reverence, tucked under the chin of the Abbot by the Refectioner; and nought was wanting to commence the repast, save the presence of Sir Piercie Shafton, who at length appeared, glittering like the sun, in a carnation-velvet doublet, slashed and puffed out with cloth of silver, his hat of the newest block, surrounded by a hat-band of goldsmith's work, while around his neck he wore a collar of gold, set with rubies and topazes so rich, that it vindicated his anxiety for the safety of his baggage from being founded upon his love of mere finery. This gorgeous collar or chain, resembling those worn by the knights of the highest orders of chivalry, fell down on his breast, and terminated in a medallion.

„We waited for Sir Piercie Shafton,“ said the Abbot, hastily assuming his place in the great chair which the Kitchener advanced to the table with ready hand.

„I pray your pardon, reverend father and my good lord,“ replied that pink of courtesy; „I did but wait to cast my riding slough, and to transmew myself into some civil form meet for this worshipful company.“

„I cannot but praise your gallantry, Sir Knight,“ said the Abbot, „and your prudence also, for chusing the fitting time to appear thus adorned. Certes, had that goodly chain been visible in some part of your late progress, there was risk that the lawful owner might have parted company therewith.“

„This chain, said your reverence?“ answered Sir Piercie; „surely it is but a toy, a trifle, a slight thing which shews but poorly with this doublet—marry, when I wear that of the murrey-coloured, double-piled Genoa velvet, puffed out with ciprus, the gems, being relieved and set off by the darker and more grave ground of the stuff, show like stars giving a lustre through dark clouds.“

„I nothing doubt it,“ said the Abbot, „but I pray you to sit down at the board.“

But Sir Piercie had now got into his element, and was not easily interrupted — „I own,“ he continued, „that slight as the toy is, it might perchance have had some captivation for Julian—Santa Maria!“ said he, interrupting himself; „what was I about to say, and my fair and beautiful Protection, or shall I rather term her my Discretion, here in presence — Indiscreet hath it been in your Affability, O most lovely Discretion, to suffer a stray word to have broke out of the pen-fold of his mouth, that might overleap the fence of civility, and trespass on the manor of decorum.“

„Marry!“ said the Abbot, somewhat impatiently, „the greatest discretion that I can see in the matter is, to eat our victuals being hot—Father Eustace, say the Benedicite, and cut up the haunch.“

The Sub-Prior readily obeyed the first part of the Abbot's injunction, but paused upon the second — „It is Friday, most reverend,“ he said in Latin, desirous that the hint should escape, if possible, the ears of the stranger.

„We are travellers,“ said the Abbot in reply, „and viatoribus licitum est — You know the canon — a traveller must eat what food his hard fate sets before him.—I grant you all a dispensation to eat flesh this day, conditionally that you brethren, say the Confiteor at curfew time, that the knight give alms to his ability, and that all and each of you fast from flesh on such day within the next month that shall seem most convenient; wherefore fall to and eat your food with cheerful countenances, and you, Father Refectioner, da mixtus."

While the Abbot was thus stating the conditions on which his indulgence was granted, he had already half finished a slice of the noble haunch, and now washed it down with a flagon of rhenish, modestly tempered with water.

"Well it is said," he observed, as he required from the Refectioner another slice, "that virtue is its own reward; for though this is but humble fare, and hastily prepared, and eaten in a poor chamber, I do not remember me of having had such an appetite since I was a simple brother in the Abbey of Dundrennan, and was wont to labour in the garden from morning until noons, when our Abbot struck the cymbalum. Then would I enter keen with hunger, parched with thirst, (da mihi vinum quaeso, et merum sit,) and partake with appetite of whatever was set before us, according to our rule; feast or fast day caritas or penitentia, was the same to me. I had no stomach complaints then, which now crave both the aid of wine and choice cookery, to render my food acceptable to my palate, and easy of digestion."

"It may be, holy father," said the Sub-Prior, "an occasional ride to the extremity of Saint Mary's patrimony, may have the same happy effect on your health as the air of the gardens at Dundrennan."

"Perchance, with our patroness's blessing, such progresses may advantage us," said the Abbot; "having an especial eye that our venison is carefully killed by some woodsman that is master of his craft.“

„If the Lord Abbot will permit me,“ said the Kitchener, „I think the best way to assure his lordship on that important point, would be to retain as a yeoman-pricker, or deputy-ranger, the eldest son of this good woman, Dame Glendinning, who is here to wait upon us. I should know by mine office what belongs to killing of game, and I can safely pronounce that never saw I, or any other coquinarius, a bolt so justly shot. It has cloven the very heart of the buck.“

„What speak you to us of one good shot, father,“ said Sir Piercie; „I would advise you that such no more maketh a shooter, than doth one swallow make a summer — I have seen this springald of whom you speak, and if his hand can send forth his shafts as boldly as his tongue doth utter presumptuous speeches, I will own him as good an archer as Robin Hood.“

„Marry,“ said the Abbot, „and it is fitting we know the truth of this matter from the dame herself, for ill - advised were we to give way to any rashness in this matter, whereby the bounties which heaven and our patroness provide might be unskilfully mangled, and rendered unfit for worthy men's use. — Stand forth, therefore, Dame Glendinning, and tell to us, as thy liege lord and spiritual Superior, using plainness and truth, without either fear or favour, as being a matter wherein we are deeply interested, Doth this son of thine use his bow as well as the Father Kitchener avers to us?“

„So please your noble fatherhood,“ answered Dame Glendinning, with a deep courtesy; „I should should know somewhat of archery to my cost, seeing my husband — God assoilzie him! — was slain in the field of Pinkey with an arrow-shot, while he was fighting under the Kirk's banner, as became a liege vassal of the Halidome. He was a valiant man, please your reverence, and an honest; and saving that he loved a bit of venison, and shifted for his living at a time as Border-men will sometimes do, I wot nought of sin that he did. And yet, though I have paid for mass after mass to the matter of a forty shilling, besides a quarter of wheat and four firlots of rye, I can have no assurance yet that he has been delivered from purgatory."

„Dame," said the Lord Abbot, „this shall be looked into heedfully; and since thy husband fell, as thou sayest, in the Kirk's quarrel, and under her banner, rely upon it that we will have him out of purgatory forthwith — that is, always providing he be there. — But it is not of thy husband whom we now devise to speak, but of thy son; not of a shot Scotsman, but of a shot deer — Wherefore I say, answer me to the point, is thy son a practiced archer, ay or no?"

„Alack! my reverend lord," answered the widow; „and my croft would be better tilled, if I could answer your reverence that he is not. — Practised archer! — marry, holy sir, I would he would practise something else — cross-bow and long-bow, hand-gun and hack-but, falconet and saker, he can shoot with them all. And if it would please this right honourable gentleman, our guest, to hold out his hat at the distance of an hundred yards, our Halbert shall send shaft, bolt, or bullet through it, (so that right honourable gentleman swerve not, but hold out steady,) and I will forfeit a quarter of barley if he touch but a knot of his ribbands. I have seen our old Martin do as much, and so has our right reverend the Sub-Prior, if he be pleased to remember it."

"I am not like to forget it, dame," said Father Eustace; "for I knew not which most to admire, the composure of the young marksman, or the steadiness of the old mark. Yet I presume not to advise Sir Piercie Shafton to subject his valuable beaver, and yet more valuable person, to such a risk, unless it should be his own especial pleasure."

"Be assured it is not," said Sir Piercie Shafton, something hastily, "be well assured, holy father, that it is not. I dispute not the lad's qualities, for which your reverence vouches. But bows are but wood, strings are but flax, or the silk worm excrement at best; archers are but men, fingers may slip, eyes may dazzle, the blindest may hit the butt, the best marker may shoot a bow's length beside. Therefore will we try no perilous experiments."

"Be that as you will, Sir Piercie," said the Abbot; "meantime we will name this youth bow-bearer in the forest granted to us by good King David, that the chace might recreate our wearied spirits, the flesh of the deer improve our poor commons, and the hides cover the books of our library; thus tending at once to the sustenance of body and soul."

"Kneel down, woman, kneel down," said the Refectioner and the Kitchener, with one voice, to Dame Glendinning, "and kiss his lordship's hand, for the grace which he has granted to thy son."

They then, as if they had been chaunting the service and the responses, set off in a sort of duetto, enumerating the advantages of the situation.

„A green gown and a pair of leathern gally-gaskins every Pentecost," said the Kitchener.

„Four marks by the year at Candlemas," answered the Refectioner.

„An hogshead of ale at Marttemas, of the double strike, and single ale at pleasure, as he shall agree with the Cellarer"—

„Who is a reasonable man," said the Abbot, „and will encourage an active servant of the convent."

„A mess of broth and a dole of mutton or beef, at the Kitchener's, on each high holiday," resumed the Kitchener.

„The gang of two cows and a palfrey on Our Lady's meadow," answered his brother officer.

„An ox-hide to make buskins of yearly, because of the brambles," echoed the Kitchener.

„And various other perquisites, quae nune praescribere longum," said the Abbot, summing with his own lordly voice, the advantages attached to the office of conventual bow-bearer.

Dame Glendinning was all this while on her knees, her head mechanically turning from the one church-officer to the other, which, as they stood one on each side of her, had much the appearance of a figure moved by clock-work, and so soon as they were silent, most devoutly did she kiss the munificent hand of the Abbot. Conscious, however, of Halbert's intractability in some points, she could not help qualifying her grateful and reiterated thanks for the Abbot's bountiful proffer, with a hope that Halbert would see his wisdom, and accept of it.

„How,“ said the Abbot, bending his brows, „accept of it? — Woman, is thy son in his right wits?“

Elspeth, stunned by the tone in which this question was asked, was altogether unable to reply to it. Indeed, any answer she might have made could hardly have been heard, as it pleased the two office-bearers of the Abbot's table again to recommence their alternate dialogue.

„Refuse?“ said the Kitchener.

„Refuse?“ answered the Refectioner, echoing the other's word in a tone of still louder astonishment „Refuse four marks by the year!“ said the one.

„Ale and beer — broth and mutton — cow's-grass and palfrey's!“ shouted the Kitchener.

„Gown and galligaskins!“ responded the Refectioner.

„A moment's patience, my brethren,“ answered the Sub-Prior, „and let us not be thus astonished before cause is afforded of our amazement. This good dame best knoweth the temper and spirit of her son — thus much I can say, that it lieth not towards letters or learning, of which I have in vain endeavoured to instil into him some tincture. Nevertheless, he is a youth of no common spirit, but much like those (in my weak judgment) whom God raises up among a people when he meaneth that their deliverance shall be wrought out with strength of hand and valour of heart.— Such men we have seen marked by a waywardness, and even an obstinacy of character which hath appeared intractability and stupidity to those among whom they walked and were conversant, until the very opportunity hath arrived in which it was the will of Providence that they should be the fitting instrument of great things.“

„Now, in good time hast thou spoken, Father Eustace,“ said the Abbot; „and we will see this swankie before we decide upon the means of employing him. — How say you, Sir Piercie Shafton, is it not the court fashion to suit the man to the office, and not the office to the man?“

„So please your reverence and lordship,“ answered the Northumbrian knight, „I do partly, that is, in some sort, subscribe to what your wisdom hath delivered— Nevertheless, under reverence of the Sub-Prior, we do not look for gallant leaders and national deliverers in the hovels of the mean common people. Credit me, that if there be some flashes of martial spirit about this young person, which I am not called upon to dispute, (though I have seldom seen that presumption and arrogance was made good upon the upshot by deed and action), yet still these will prove unable to distinguish him, save in his own limited and lowly sphere — even as the glow-worm, which makes a goodly shew among the grass of the field, would be of little avail if deposited in a beacon-grate.“

„Now, in good time,“ said the Sub-Prior, „and here comes the young huntsman to speak for himself; „for, being placed opposite to the window, he could observe Halbert as he ascended the little mound on which the tower was situated.

„Summon him to our presence,“ said the Lord Abbot; and with an obedient start the two attendant monks went off with emulous alertness, Dame Glendinning sprung away at the same moment, partly to gain an instant to recommend obedience to her son, partly to prevail with him to change his apparel, before coming in presence of the Abbot, But the Kitchener and Refectioner, both speaking at once, had already seized each an arm, and were leading Halbert in triumph into the apartment, - so that she could only ejaculate, „His will be done — but an he had but had on him his Sunday's hose!“

Limited and humble as this desire was, the fates did not grant it, for Halbert Glendinning was hurried into the presence of the Lord Abbot and his party without a word of explanation, and without a moment's time being allowed to assume his holiday hose, which, in the language of the time, implied both breeches and stockings.

Yet though thus suddenly presented amid the centre of all eyes, there was something in Halbert's appearance which commanded a certain degree of respect from the company into which he was so unceremoniously intruded, and the greater part of whom were disposed to consider him with hauteur, if not with absolute contempt. But his appearance and reception we must devote to another chapter.

CHAPTER VI.

Now chuse thee, gallant, betwixt wealth and honour;
There lies the pelf, in sum to bear thee through
The dance of youth, and the turmoil of manhood,
Yet leave enough for age's chimney-corner;
But an thou grasp to it, farewell Ambition,
Farewell each hope of bettering thy condition,
And raising thy low rank above the churls
That till the earth for bread,

Old Play.

It is necessary to dwell for some brief space on the appearance and demeanour of young Glendinning, ere we proceed to describe his interview with the Abbot of Saint Mary's, at this momentous crisis of his life.

Halbert was now about nineteen years old, tall and active rather than strong, yet of that hardy confirmation of limb and sinew, which promises great strength when the growth shall be complete and the system confirmed. He was perfectly well made, and like most men who have that advantage, possessed a grace and natural ease of manner and carriage, which prevented his height from being the distinguished part of his external appearance. It was not until you had compared his stature with that of those amongst, or near to whom he stood, that you became sensible that the young Glendinning was upwards of six feet high. In the combination of unusual height, with perfect symmetry, case, and grace of carriage, the young heir of Glendearg, notwithstanding his rustic birth and education, had greatly the advantage even of Sir Piercie Shafton himself, whose stature was lower, and his limbs, though there was no particular point to object to, were on the whole less exactly proportioned. On the other hand, Sir Piercie's very handsome countenance afforded him as decided an advantage over the Scotsman, as regularity of features and brilliance of complexion could give over traits which were rather strongly marked than beautiful, and upon whose complexion the „skyey influences,“ to which he was constantly exposed, had blended the red and white into the purely nut-brown hue, which coloured alike cheeks, neck, and forehead, and blushed only in a darker glow upon the former. — Halbert's eyes supplied a marked and distinguished part of his physiognomy. They were large and of a hazel colour, and sparkled in moments of animation, with such uncommon brilliancy, that it seemed as if they actually emitted light. Nature had closely curled the locks of dark-brown hair, which relieved and set off the features, such as we have described them, displaying a bold and animated disposition much more than might have been expected from his situation, or from his previous manners, which hitherto had seemed bashful, homely, and awkward

Halbert's dress was certainly not of that description which sets off to the best advantage a presence of itself prepossessing. His jerkin and hose were of coarse rustic cloth, and his cap of the same. A belt round his waist served at once to sustain the broad-sword which we have already mentioned, and to hold five or six arrows and bird-bolts, which were stuck into it on the right side, along with a large knife hilted with buck-horn, or, as it was then called, a dudgeon dagger. To complete his dress, we must notice his loose buskins of deer'shide, formed so as to draw up on the leg as high as the knee, or at pleasure to be thrust down lower than the calves. These were generally used at the period by such as either had their principal occupation, or their chief pleasure, in sylvan sports, as they served to protect the legs against the rough and tangled thickets into which the pursuit of game frequently led them. — And these trifling particulars complete his external appearance.

It is not so easy to do justice to the manner in which young Glendinning's soul spoke through his eyes, when ushered so suddenly into the company of those whom his earliest education had taught him to treat with awe and reverence. The degree of embarrassment which his demeanour evinced, had nothing in it either meanly servile, or utterly disconcerted. It was no more than became a generous and ingenuous youth of a bold spirit, but totally inexperienced, who should for the first time be called upon to think and act for himself in such society, and under such disadvantageous circumstances. There was not in his carriage a grain either of forwardness or of timidity, which a friend could have wished away.

He kneeled and kissed the Abbot's hand, then rose, and retiring two paces, bowed respectfully to the circle around, smiling gently as he received an encouraging nod from the Sub-Prior, to whom alone he was personally known, and blushing as he encountered the anxious look of Mary Avenel, who beheld with painful interest the sort of ordeal to which her foster-brother was about to be subjected. Recovering from the transient flurry of spirits into which the encounter of her glance had thrown him, he stood composedly awaiting till the Abbot should express his pleasure.

The ingenuous expression of countenance, noble form, and gracefull attitude of the young man, failed not to prepossess in his favour the churchmen in whose presence he stood. The Abbot looked round and exchanged a gracious and approving glance with his counsellor Father Eustace, although probably the appointment of a ranger, or bow-bearer, was one in which he might have been disposed to proceed without the Sub-Prior's advice, were it but to shew his own free agency. But the good mien of the young man now in nomination was such, that he rather hastened to exchange congratulation on meeting with so proper a subject of promotion, than to indulge any other feeling. Father Eustace enjoyed the pleasure which a well-constituted mind derives from seeing a benefit light on a deserving object; for as he had not seen Halbert since circumstances had made a material change in his manner and feelings, he scarce doubted that the proffered appointment would, notwithstanding his mother's uncertainty, suit the disposition of a youth who had appeared devoted to woodland sports, and a foe alike to sedentary or settled occupation. The Refectioner and Kitchener were so well pleased with Halbert's prepossessing appearance, that they seemed to think that the salary, emoluments, and perquisites, the dole, the grazing, the gown, and the galligaskins, could scarce be better bestowed than on the active and graceful figure before them.

Sir Piercie Shafton, whether from being more deeply engaged in his own cogitations, or that the subject was unworthy his notice, did not seem to partake of the general feeling of approbation excited by the young man's presence. He sate with his eyes half shut, and his arms folded, appearing to be wrapped in contemplations of a nature deeper than those arising out of the scene before him. But, notwithstanding his seeming abstraction and absence of mind, there was a flutter of vanity in Sir Piercie's very handsome countenance, an occasional change of posture from one striking attitude (or what he conceived to be such,) to another, and an occasional stolen glance at the female part of the company, to spy how far he succeeded in rivetting their attention, which gave a marked advantage, in comparison, to the less regular and more harsh features of Halbert Glendinning, with their composed, manly, and deliberate expression of mental fortitude.

Of the females belonging to the family of Glendearg, the Miller's daughter alone had her mind sufficiently at leisure to admire, from time to time, the graceful attitudes of Sir Piercie Shafton; for both Mary Avenel and Dame Glendinning were waiting in anxiety and apprehension the answer which Halbert was to return to the Abbot's proposal, and fearfully anticipating the consequences of his probable refusal. The conduct of his brother Edward was, for a lad constitutionally shy, respectful, and even timid, at once affectionate and noble. This younger son of Dame Elspeth had stood unnoticed in a corner, after the Abbot, at the request of the Sub-Prior, had honoured him with some passing notice, and asked him a few common-place questions about his progress in Donatus, and in the Promptuarium Parvulorum, without waiting for the answers. From his corner he now glided round to his brother's side, and keeping a little behind him, slid his right hand into the huntsman's left, and by a gentle pressure, which Halbert instantly and ardently returned, expressed at once his interest in his situation, and his resolution to share his fate.

The groupe was thus arranged, when, after the pause of two or three minutes, which he employed in slowly sipping his cup of wine, in order that he might enter on his proposal with due and deliberate dignity, the Abbot at length expressed himself thus:

„My son — we your lawful superior, and the Abbot, under God's favour, of the community of Saint Mary's, have heard of your manifold good gifts — a-hem — especially touching woodcraft — and the huntsmanlike fashion in which you strike your game, truly and as a yeoman should, not abusing Heaven's good benefits by spoiling the flesh, as is too often seen in careless rangers — a-hem.“ He made here a pause, but observing that Glendinning only replied to his compliment by a bow, he proceeded, — „My son, we commend your modesty; nevertheless, we will that thou should'st speak freely to us touching that which we have premeditated for thine advancement, meaning to confer on thee the office of bow-bearer and ranger, as well over the chases and forests wherein our house hath privilege by the gifts of pious kings and nobles, whose souls now enjoy the fruits of their bounties to the church, as to those which belong to us in exclusive right of property and perpetuity. Thy knee, my son — that we may, with our own hand, and without loss of time, induct thee into office.“

„Kneel down,“ said the Kitchener on the one side; and „Kneel down,“ said the Refectitioner on the other.

But Halbert Glendinning remained standing.

„Were it to shew gratitude and goodwill for your reverend lordship's noble offer, I could not,“ he said, „kneel low enough, or remain long enough kneeling. But I may not kneel to take investiture of your noble gift, my Lord Abbot, being a man determined to seek my fortune otherwise.“

„How is that, sir?“ said the Abbot, knitting his brows; „do I hear you speak aright? and do you, a born vassal of the Halidome, at the moment when I am destining to you such a noble expression of my good will, propose exchanging my service for that of any other?“

„My lord,“ said Halbert Glendinning, „it grieves me to think you hold me capable of undervaluing your gracious offer, or of exchanging your service for another. But your noble proffer doth but hasten the execution of a resolution which I have long since formed.“

„Ay, my son,“ said the Abbot, „is it indeed so? — right early have you learned to form resolutions without consulting those on whom you naturally depend. But what may it be, this sagacious resolution, if I may so far pray you?“

„To yield up to my brother and mother,“ answered Halbert, „mine interest in the fief of Glendearg, lately possessed by my father, Simon Glendinning: and having prayed your lordship to be the same kind and generous master to them, that your predecessors, the venerable Abbots of Saint Mary’s, have been to my father in time past, for myself, I am determined to seek my fortune where I may best find it.“

Dame Glendinning here ventured, emboldened by maternal anxiety, to break silence with an exclamation of „O my son!“ Edward, clinging to his brother’s side, half spoke, half whispered a similar ejaculation, of „Brother! brother!“

The Sub-Prior took up the matter in a tone of grave reprehension, which, as he conceived, the interest he had always taken in the family of Glendearg required at his hand.

„Wilful young man,“ he said, „what folly can urge thee to push back the hand that is stretched out to aid thee? What visionary aim hast thou before thee, that can compensate for the decent and sufficient independence which thou art now rejecting with scorn?“

„Four marks by the year, duly and truly,“ said the Kitchener.

„Cow’s-grass, doublet, and galligaskins,“ answered the Refectioner.

„Peace, my brethren,“ said the Sub-Prior;

„and may it please your lordship, venerable father, upon my petition, to allow this headstrong youth a day for consideration, and it shall be my part so to endoctrinate him, as to convince him what is due on this occasion to your lordship, and to his family, and to himself.“

„Your kindness, reverend father,“ said the youth, „craves my dearest thanks — it is the continuance of a long train of benevolence towards me, for which I give you my gratitude, for I have nothing else to offer. It is my mis-hap, not your fault, that your intentions have been frustrated. But my present resolution is fixed and unalterable I cannot accept the generous offer of the Lord Abbot; my fate calls me elsewhere, to scenes where I shall end it or mend it.“

„By Our Lady,“ said the Abbot, „I think the youth be mad indeed — or that you, Sir Piercie, judged of him most truly, when you prophesied that he would prove unfit for the promotion we designed him — it may be you knew something of this wayward humour before?“

„By the mass, not I,“ answered Sir Piercie Shafton, with his usual indifference. „I but judged of him by his birth and breeding; for seldom doth a good hawk come out of a kite's egg.“

„Thou art thyself a kite, and kestrel to boot,“ replied Halbert Glendinning, without a moment's hesitation.

„This in our presence, and to a man of worship!“ said the Abbot, the blood rushing to his face.

„Yes, my lord,“ answered the youth; „even in your presence I return to this gay man's face, the causeless dishonour which he has flung on my name. My brave father, who fell in the cause of his country, demands that justice at the hands of his son!“

„Unmannered boy!“ said the Abbot.

„Nay, my good lord,“ said the knight, „praying pardon for the coarse interruption, let me pray you not to be wroth with this rustical — Credit me, the north wind shall as soon puff one of your rocks from its basis, as aught which I hold so slight and inconsiderate as the churlish speech of an untaught churl, shall move the spleen of Piercie Shafton.“

„Proud as you are, Sir Knight,“ said Halbert, „in your imagined superiority, be not too confident that thou can'st not be moved.“

„Faith, by nothing that thou can'st urge,“ said Sir Piercie.

„Knowest thou then this token?“ said young Glendinning, offering to him the silver bodkin which he had received from the White Lady.

Never was such an instant change, from the most contemptuous serenity, to the most furious state of passion, as that which Sir Piercie Shafton exhibited. It was the difference between a cannon standing loaded in its embrasure, and the same gun when touched by the linstock. He started up, every limb quivering with rage, and his features so inflamed and agitated by passion, that he more resembled a demoniac, than a man under the regulation of reason. He clenched both his fists, and thrusting them forward, offered them furiously at the face of Glendinning, who who was even himself startled at the frantic state of excitation which his action had occasioned. The next moment he withdrew them, struck his open palm against his own forehead, and rushed out of the room in a state of indescribable agitation. The whole matter had been so sudden, that no person present had time to interfere.

When Sir Piercie Shafton had left the apartment, there was a moment's pause of astonishment; and then a general demand that Halbert Glendinning should instantly explain by what means he had produced such a violent change in the deportment of the English cavalier.

„I did nought to him,“ answered Halbert Glendinning, „but what you all saw — am I to answer for his fantastic freaks of humour?“

„Boy,“ said the Abbot, in his most authoritative manner, „these subterfuges shall not avail thee. This is not a man to be driven from his temperament without some sufficient cause. That cause was given by thee, and must have been known to thee. I command thee, as thou wilt save thyself from worse measure, to explain to me by what means thou hast moved our friend thus — We chuse not that our vassals shall drive our guests mad in our very presence, and we remain ignorant of the means whereby that purpose is effected.“

„So may it please your reverence, I did but show him this token,“ said Halbert Glendinning, delivering it at the same time to the Abbot, who looked at it with much attention, and then, shaking his head, gravely delivered it to the Sub-Prior, without speaking a word.

Father Enstace looked at the mysterious token with some attention; and then addressing Halbert in a severe voice, said, „Young man, if thou would'st not have us suspect thee of some strange double-dealing in this matter, let us instantly know whence thou had'st this token, and how it possesses an influence on Sir Piercie Shafton?“ — It would have been extremely difficult for Halbert, thus hard pressed, to have either evaded or answered so puzzling a question. To have avowed the truth might, in these times, have occasioned his being burnt at a stake, although, in ours, his confession would have only gained for him the credit of a liar beyond all rational credibility. He was fortunately relieved by the return of Sir Piercie Shafton himself, whose ear caught, as he entered, the sound of the Sub-Prior's question.

Without waiting until Halbert Glendinning replied, he came forward whispering to him as he passed, „Be secret — thou shalt have the satisfaction thou hast dared to seek for.“

When he returned to his place, there were still marks of discomposure on his brow; but, becoming apparently collected and calm, he looked around him, and apologized for the indecorum of which he had been guilty, which he ascribed to sudden and severe indisposition. All were silent, and looked on each other with some surprise.

The Lord Abbot gave orders for all to retire from the apartment, save himself, Sir Piercie Shafton, and the Sub-Prior. „And have an eye,“ he added, „on that bold youth, that he escape not; for if he hath practised by charm, or otherwise, on the health of our worshipful guest, I swear by the alb and mitre which I wear, that his punishment shall be most exemplary."

"My lord and venerable father," said Halbert, bowing respectfully, "fear not but that I will abide my doom. I think you will best learn from the worshipful knight himself, what is the cause of his distemperature, and how slight my share in it has been."

"Be assured," said the knight, without looking up, however, while he spoke, "I will satisfy the Lord Abbot."

With these words the company retired, and with them young Glendinning.

When the Abbot, the Sub-Prior, and the English knight were left alone, Father Eustace, contrary to his custom, could not help speaking the first. "Expound unto us, noble sir," he said, "by what mysterious means the production of this simple toy could so far move your spirit, and overcome your patience, after you had shewn yourself proof to all the provocation offered by this selfsufficient and singular youth?"

The knight took the silver bodkin from the good father's hand, looked at it with great composure, and having examined it all over, returned it to the Sub-Prior, saying at the same time, "In truth, venerable father, I cannot but marvel, that the wisdom implied alike in your silver hairs, and in your eminent rank, should, like a babbling hound (excuse the similitude) open thus loudly on a false scent. I were, indeed, more slight to be moved than the leaves of the aspin tree, which wag at the least breath of heaven, could I be moved by such a trifle as this, which in no way concerns me more than if the same quantity of silver were stricken into so many groats. Truth is, that from my youth upward, I have been subjected to such a malady as you saw me visited with even now—a cruel and searching pain, which goeth through nerve and bone, even as a good brand in the hands of a brave soldier sheers through limb and sinew—but it passes away speedily, as you yourselves may judge.“

„Still,“ said the Sub-Prior, „this will not account for the youth offering to you this piece of silver, as a token by which you were to understand something, and, as we must needs conjecture, something disagreeable.“

„Your reverence is to conjecture what you will,“ said Sir Piercie; „but I cannot pretend to lay your judgment on the right scent when I see it at fault. I hope I am not liable to be called upon to account for the foolish actions of a malapert boy?“

„Assuredly,“ said the Sub-Prior, „we shall prosecute no enquiry which is disagreeable to our guest. Nevertheless,“ said he, looking to his Superior, „this chance may, in some sort, alter the plan your lordship had formed for your worshipful guest’s residence for a brief term in this tower, as a place alike of secrecy and of security; both of which, in the terms which we now stand on with England, are circumstances to be desired.“

„In truth,“ said the Abbot, „and the doubt is well thought on, were it as well removed; for I scarce know in the Halidome so fitting a place of refuge, yet see I not how to recommend it to our worshipful guest, considering the unrestrained petulance of this headstrong youth."

„Tush! reverend sirs, — what would you make of me?" said Sir Piercie Shafton. „I protest, by mine honour, I would abide in this house were I to chuse. What! I take no exceptions at the youth for shewing a flash of spirit, though the spark may light on mine own head. I honour the lad for it. I protest I will abide here, and he shall aid me in striking down a deer. I must needs be friends with him, an he be such a shot; and we will speedily send down to my Lord Abbot a buck of the first head, killed so artificially as shall satisfy even the reverend Kitchenener."

This was said with such apparent ease and good-humour, that the Abbot made no farther observation on what had passed, but proceeded to acquaint his guest with the details of furniture, hangings, provisions, and so forth, which he purposed to send up to the Tower of Glendearg for his accomodation. This discourse, seasoned with a cup or two of wine, served to prolong the time until the reverend Abbot ordered his cavalcade to prepare for their return to the Monastery.

„As we have," he said, „in the course of this our toilsome journey, lost our meridian,* indulgence shall be given to those of our attendants who shall, from very weariness, be unable to attend the duty at prime, † and this by way of misericord or indulgentia.“ ††

* The hour of repose at noon, which, in the middle ages, was employed in slumber, and which the monastic rules of nocturnal vigils rendered necessary.

Having benevolently intimated a boon to his faithful followers, which he probably judged would be far from unacceptable, the good Abbot, seeing all ready for his journey, bestowed his blessing on the assembled household — gave his hand to be kissed by Dame Glendinning — himself kissed the cheek of Mary Avenel, and even of the Miller's maiden, when they approached to render him the same homage — commanded Halbert to rule his temper, and to be aiding and obedient in all things to the English knight — admonished Edward to be discipulus impiger atque strenuus — then took a courteous farewell of Sir Piercie Shafton, advising him to lie close, for fear of the English Borderers, who might be employed to kidnap him; and, having discharged these various offices of courtesy, moved forth to the court-yard, followed by the whole establishment. Here, with a heavy sigh approaching to a groan, the venerable father heaved himself upon his palfrey, whose dark purple housings swept the ground; and, greatly comforted that the discretion of the animal's pace would be no longer disturbed by the gambadoes of Sir Piercie † Prime was the midnight service of the Monks.

†† Misericord, according to the learned work of Fosbrooke on British Monachism, meant not only an indulgence, or exoneration from particular duties, but also a particular apartment in a Convent, where the Monks assembled to enjoy such indulgences or allowances as were granted beyond the rule.

and his prancing war-horse, he set forth at a sober and steady trot upon his return to the Monastery.

When the Sub-Prior had mounted to accompany his principal, his eye sought out Halbert, who, partly hidden by a projection of the outward wall of the court, stood apart from, and gazing upon the departing cavalcade, and the groupe which assembled around them. Unsatisfied with the explanation he had received concerning the mysterious transaction of the silver bodkin, yet interesting himself in the youth, of whose character he had formed a favourable idea, the worthy Monk resolved to take an early opportunity of investigating that matter. In the meanwhile, he looked upon Halbert with a serious and warning aspect, and held up his finger to him as he signed farewell. He then joined the rest of the churchmen, and followed his Superior down the valley.

CHAPTER VII.

I hope you'll give me cause to think you noble,
And do me right with your sword, sir, as becomes
One gentleman of honour to another;
All this is fair, sir—let us make no days on't,
I'll lead your way.

Love's Pilgrimage.

THE look and sign of warning which the Sub-Prior gave to Halbert Glendinning as they parted, went to his heart; for although he had profited much less than Edward by the good man's instructions, he had a sincere reverence for his person; and even the short time he had had for deliberation, tended to shew him he was embarked in a perilous adventure. The nature of the provocation which he had given to Sir Piercie Shafton he could not even conjecture; but he saw that it was of a mortal quality, and he was now to abide the consequences.

That he might not force these consequences forward by any premature renewal of their quarrel, he resolved to walk apart for an hour, and consider on what terms he was to meet this haughty foreigner. The time seemed propitious for his doing so without having the appearance of wilfully shunning the stranger, as all the members of the little household were dispersing either to perform such tasks as had been interrupted by the arrival of the dignitaries, or to put in order what had been deranged by their visit.

Leaving the tower, therefore, and descending, unobserved as he thought, the knoll on which it stood, Halbert gained the little piece of level ground which extended betwixt the descent of the hill, and the first sweep made by the brook after washing the foot of the eminence on which the tower was situated, where a few straggling birch and oak trees served to secure him from observation. But scarce had he reached the spot, when he was surprised to feel a smart tap upon the shoulder, and, turning around, he perceived he had been closely followed by Sir Piercie Shafton,

When, whether from our state of animal spirits, want of confidence in the justice of our cause, or any other motive, our own courage happens to be in a wavering condition, nothing tends so much altogether to disconcert us as a great appearance of promptitude on the part of our antagonist. Halbert Glendinning, both morally and constitutionally intrepid, was nevertheless somewhat troubled at seeing the stranger, whose resentment he had provoked, appear at once before him, and with an aspect which boded hostility. But though his heart might beat somewhat thicker, he was too high-spirited to exhibit any external signs of emotion. — „What is your pleasure, Sir Piercie?“ he said to the English knight, enduring without apparent discomposure all the terrors which his antagonist had summoned into his aspect.

„What is my pleasure?“ answered Sir Pier-cie; „a goodly question after the part you have acted towards me! — Young man, I know not what infatuation has led thee to place thyself in direct and insolent opposition to one who is a guest of thy liegeland the Abbot, and who, even from the courtesy due to thy mother's roof, had a right to remain there without meeting insult. Neither do I ask, or care, by what means thou hast become possessed of the fatal secret by which thou hast dared to offer me open shame. But I must now tell thee, that the possession of it hath cost thee thy life.“

„Not, I trust, if my hand and sword can defend it,“ replied Halbert, boldly.

„True,“ said the Englishman, „I mean not to deprive thee of thy fair chance of self-defence. I am only sorry to think, that, young and country-bred as thou art, it can but little avail thee. But thou must be well aware, that in this quarrel I shall use no terms of quarter.“

„Rely on it, proud man,“ answered the youth, „that I shall ask none; and although thou speakest as if I lay already at thy feet, trust me, that as I am determined never to ask thy mercy, so I am not fearful of needing it.“

„Thou wilt then,“ said the knight, „do nothing to avert the certain fate which thou hast provoked with such wantonness?“

„And how were that to be purchased?“ replied Halbert Glendinning, more with the wish of obtaining some farther insight into the terms on which he stood with this stranger, than to make him the submission which he might require.

„Explain to me instantly,“ said sir Piercie,

„without equivocation or delay, by what means thou wert enabled to wound my honour so deeply — and shouldst thou point out to me by so doing an enemy more worthy of my resentment, I will permit thine own obscure insignificance to draw a veil over thine insolence.“

„This is too high a flight,“ said Glendinning, fiercely, „for thine own presumption to soar without being checked at. Thou hast come to my father's house, as well as I can guess, a fugitive and an exile, and thy first greeting to its inhabitants has been that of contempt and injury. By what means I have been able to retort that contempt, let thine own conscience tell thee. Enough for me that I stand on the privilege of a free Scottish-man, and will brook no insult unreturned, and no injury unrequited.“

„It is well then,“ said Sir Piercie Shafton „we will dispute this matter to-morrow morning with our swords. Let the time be day-break, and do thou assign the place. We will go forth as if to strike a deer.“

„Content,“ replied Halbert Glendinning; „I will guide thee to a spot where an hundred men might fight and fall without any chance of interruption,“

„It is well,“ answered Sir Piercie Shafton. „Here then we part. — Many will say, that in thus indulging the right of a gentleman to the son of a clod-breaking peasant, I derogate from my sphere, even as the blessed son would derogate should he condescend to compare and match his golden beams with the twinkle of a pale, blinking, expiring, gross-fed taper. But no consideration of rank shall prevent my avenging the insult thou hast offered me. We bear a smooth face, observe me, Sir Villagio, before the worshipful inmates of yonder cabin, and to-morrow we try conclusions with our swords." So saying, he turned away towards the tower.

It may not be unworthy of notice, that in the last speech only, had Sir Piercie used some of those flowers of rhetoric which characterised the usual style of his conversation. Apparently, a sense of wounded honour, and the deep desire of vindicating his injured feelings, had proved too strong for the fantastic affectation of his acquired habits. Indeed, such is usually the influence of energy of mind, when called forth and exerted, that Sir Piercie Shafton had never appeared in the eyes of his youthful antagonist half so much deserving of esteem and respect as in this brief dialogue, by which they exchanged mutual defiance. As he followed him slowly to the tower, he could not help thinking to himself, that, had the English knight always displayed this superior tone of bearing and feeling, he would not probably have felt so earnestly disposed to take offence at his hand. Mortal offence, however, had been exchanged, and the matter was to be put to mortal arbitrement.

The family met at the evening meal, when Sir Piercie Shafton extended the benignity of his countenance and the graces of his conversation far more generally over the party than he had hitherto condescended to do. The greater part of his attention was, of course, still engrossed by his divine and inimitable Discretion, as he chose to term Mary Avenel; but, nevertheless, there were interjectional flourishes to the maid of the mill, under the title of Comely Damsel, and to the dame, under that of Worthy Matron. Nay, lest he should fail to excite their admiration by the graces of his rhetoric, he generously, and without solicitation, added those of his voice; and after regretting bitterly the absence of his viol-de-gambo, he regaled them with a song, „which,“ said he, „the inimitable Astrophel, whom mortals call Philip Sidney, composed in the non-age of his muse, to shew the world what they are to expect from his riper years, and which will one day see the light in that not-to-be-paralleled perfection of human wit, which he has addressed to his sister, the matchless Parthenope, whom men call Countess of Pembroke; a work,“ he continued, „whereof his friendship hath permitted me, though unworthy, to be an occasional partaker, and whereof I may well say, that the deep afflictive tale which awakeneth our sorrows, is so relieved with brilliant similitudes, dulcet descriptions, pleasant poems, and engaging interludes, that they seem as the stars of the firmament, beautifying the dusky robe of night. And though I wot well how much the lovely and quaint language will suffer by my widowed voice, widowed in that it is no longer matched by my beloved viol-de-gambo, I will essay to give you a taste of the ravishing sweetness of the poesy of the un-to-be-imitated Astrophel.“

So saying, he sung without mercy or remorse about five hundred verses, of which the two first and the four last may suffice for a specimen —

What tongue can her perfections tell,
On whose each part all pens may dwell,

* * * * *

Of whose high praise and praiseful bliss,

Goodness the pen, Heaven paper is;

The ink immortal fame doth send,

As I began so I must end.

As Sir Piercie Shafton always sung with his eyes half shut, it was not until, agreeable to the promise of his poetry, he had fairly made an end, that, looking round, he discovered that the greater part of his audience had, in the meanwhile, yielded to the charms of repose. Mary Avenel, indeed, from a natural sense of politeness, had contrived to keep awake through all the prolixities of the divine Astrophel; but Mysie was in dreams transported back to the dusty atmosphere of her father's mill. Edward himself, who had given his attention for some time, had at length fallen fast asleep; and the good dame's nose, could its tones have been put under regulation, might have supplied the bass of the lamented viol-de-gambo. Halbert alone, who had no temptation to give way to the charms of slumber, remained awake with his eyes fixed on the songster; not that he was better entertained with the words, or more ravished with the execution, than the rest of the company, but rather because he admired, or perhaps envied, the composure, which could thus spend the evening in interminable madrigals, when the next morning was to be devoted to deadly combat. Yet it struck his natural acuteness of observation, that the eye of the gallant cavalier did now and then, furtively as it were, seek a glance of his countenance, as if to discover how he was taking the exhibition of his antagonist's composure and serenity of mind.

„He shall read nothing in my countenance,“ thought Halbert, proudly, „that can make him think my indifference less than his own.“

And taking from the shelf a bag full of miscellaneous matters collected for the purpose, he began with great industry to dress hooks, and had finished half-a-dozen of flies (we are enabled, for the benefit of those who admire the antiquities of the gentle art of angling, to state that they were brown hackles,) by the time that Sir Piercie had arrived at the conclusion of his long-winded strophes of the divine Astrophel. So that he also testified a magnanimous contempt of that which to-morrow should bring forth.

As it now waxed late, the family of Glendearg separated for the evening; Sir Piercie first saying to the dame that „her son Albert.—“

„Halbert,“ said Elspeth, with emphasis, „Halbert; after his goodsire, Halbert Brydone.“

„Well, then, I have prayed your son Halbert, that we may strive to-morrow with the sun's earliness to wake a stag from his lair, that I may see whether he be as prompt at that sport as fame bespeaks him.“

„Alas! sir,“ answered Dame Elspeth, „he is but too prompt, an you talk of promptitude, at any thing that has steel at one end of it and mischief at the other. But he is at your honourable disposal, and I trust you will teach him how obedience is due to our venerable father and lord, the Abbot, and prevail with him to take the bow-bearer's place in fee; for, as the two worthy monks said, it will be a great help to a widow-woman."

„Trust me, good dame," replied Sir Piercie, „it is my purpose so to endoctrinate him, touching his conduct and bearing towards his betters, that he shall not lightly depart from the reverence due to them. — We meet, then, beneath the birchtrees in the plain," he said, looking to Halbert, „so soon as the eye of day hath opened its lids." — Halbert answered with a sign of acquiescence, and the knight proceeded, „And now, having wished to my fairest Discretion those pleasant dreams which wave their opinions around the couch of sleeping beauty, and to this comely damsel the bounties of Morpheus, and to all others the common good-night, I will crave you leave to depart to my place of rest, though I may say with the poet,

„Ah rest! — no rest but change of place and posture;
Ah sleep! — no sleep but worn-out Nature's swooning;
Ah bed! — no bed but cushion filled with stones;
Rest, sleep, nor bed, await not on an exile."

With a delicate obeisance he left the room, evading Dame Glendinning, who hastened to assure him he would find his accommodations for repose much more agreeable than they had been the night before, there having been store of warm coverlids, and a soft feather-bed, sent up from the Abbey. But the good Knight probably thought that the grace and effect of his exit would be diminished, if he were recalled from his heroics to discuss such sublunary and domestic topics, and therefore hastened away without waiting to hear her out.

„A pleasant gentleman,“ said Dame Glendinning; „but I will warrant him an humorous* — And sings a sweet song, though it is somewhat of the longest. — Well, I make mine avow he is goodly company — I wonder when he will go away.“

Having thus expressed her respect for her guest, not without intimation that she was heartily tired of his company, the good dame gave the signal for the family to disperse, and laid her injunctions on Halbert to attend Sir Piercie Shafton at day-break, as he required.

When stretched on his pallet by his brother's side, Halbert had no small cause to envy the sound sleep which instantly settled on the eyes of Edward, but refused him any share of its influence. He saw now too well what the spirit had darkly indicated, that, in granting the boon which he had asked so unadvisedly, she had contributed more to his harm than his good. He was now sensible, too late, of the various dangers and inconveniences with which his dearest friends were threatened, alike by his discomfiture or his success in the approaching duel. If he fell, he might say personally, „good night all.“ But it was not the less certain that he should leave a dreadful legacy of distress and embarrassment to his mother and family, — an anticipation which by no means tended to render the front of death, in itself a griesly object, more agreeable to the imagination. The vengeance of the Abbot, his conscience told him, was sure to descend on his mother and brother, or could only be averted by the generosity of the victor — And Mary Avenel — he should have shewn himself, if he succumbed in the present combat, as inefficient in protecting her, as he had been unnecessarily active in bringing disaster on her, and on the house in which she had been protected from infancy. And to this view of the case were to be added all those embittered and anxious feelings with which the bravest men, even in a better or less doubtful quarrel, regard the issue of a doubtful conflict, the first time when it has been their fate to engage in an affair of that nature.

* Humorous — full of whims — thus Shakspeare, „humorous as Winter.“ — The vulgar word humour-some comes nearest to the meaning.

But however disconsolate the prospect seemed in the event of his being conquered, Halbert could expect from victory little more than the safety of his own life, and the gratification of his wounded pride. To his friends — to his mother and brother — especially to Mary Avenel — the consequences of his triumph would be more certain destruction than the contingency of his defeat and death. If the English knight survived, he might in courtesy extend his protection to them; but if he fell, nothing was likely to screen them from the vindictive measures which the Abbot and convent would surely adopt against the violation of the peace of the Halidome, and the slaughter of a protected guest by one of their own vassals, within whose house they had lodged him for shelter. These thoughts, in which neither view of the case augured aught short of ruin to his family, and that ruin entirely brought on by his own rashness, were thorns in Halbert Glendinning's pillow, and deprived his soul of peace, and his eyes of slumber.

There appeared no middle course, saving one which was marked by degradation, and which, even if he stooped to it, was by no means free of danger. He might indeed confess to the English knight the strange circumstances which led to his presenting him with that token which the White Lady, (in her displeasure as it now seemed,) had given him, that he might offer it to Sir Piercie Shafton. But to this avowal his pride could not stoop, and reason, who is wonderfully ready to be of counsel with pride on such occasions, offered many arguments to shew it would be useless as well as mean so far to degrade himself. „If I tell a tale so wonderful,” thought he, „shall I not either be stigmatized as a liar, or punished as a wizard?—Were Sir Piercie Shafton generous, noble, and benevolent, as the champions of whom we hear in romance, I might indeed gain his ear, and, without demeaning myself, escape from the situation in which I am placed. But he is, or at least seems to be, self-conceited, arrogant, vain, and presumptuous — I should but humble myself in vain — And I will not humble myself!” he said, starting out of bed, grasping to his broad-sword, and brandishing it in the light of the moon, which streamed through the deep niche that served them as a window; when, to his extreme surprise and terror, an airy form stood in the moonlight, but intercepted not the reflection on the floor. Dimly as it was expressed, the sound of the voice soon made him sensible he saw the White Lady.

At no time had her presence seemed so terrific to him; for when he had invoked her, it was with the expectation of the apparition, and the determination to abide the issue. But now she had come uncalled, and her presence impressed him with a sense of approaching misfortune, and with the hideous apprehension that he had associated himself with a demon, over whose motions he had no controul, and of whose powers and quality he had no certain knowledge. He remained, therefore, in mere terror, gazing on the apparition, which chaunted or recited in cadence the following lines —

„He whose heart for vengeance sued,
Must not shrink from shedding blood;
The knot that thou hast tied with word,
Thou must loose by edge of sword.“

„Avaunt thee, false Spirit!“ said Halbert Glendinning; „I have bought thy advice too dearly already — Begone, in the name of God!“

The Spirit laughed; and the cold unnatural sound of her laughter had something in it more fearful than the usual melancholy tones of her voice. She then replied.

„You have summon'd me once — you have summon'd me twice,
And without e'er a summons I come to you thrice;
Unask'd for, unsued for, you came to my glen,
Unsued and unask'd, I am with you again.“

Halbert Glendinning gave way for a moment to terror, and called on his brother, „Edward! waken, waken, for Our Lady's sake!“

Edward awaked accordingly, and asked what he wanted.

„Look out,“ said Halbert, „look up! see'st thou no one in the room?“

„No, upon my good word,“ said Edward, looking out.

„What, see'st thou nothing in the moonshine upon the floor there?“

„No, nothing,“ answered Edward, „save thyself, resting on thy naked sword. I tell thee, Halbert, thou shouldst trust more to thy spiritual arms, and less to those of steel and iron. For this many a night hast thou started and moaned, and cried out of fighting, and of spectres, and of goblins — thy sleep hath not refreshed thee — thy waking hath been a dream. — Credit me, dear Halbert, say the Pater and Credo, resign thyself to the protection of God, and thou wilt sleep sound and wake in comfort.“

„It may be,“ said Halbert slowly, and having his eye still bent on the female form which to him seemed distinctly visible, — „it may be — But tell me, dear Edward, see'st thou no one on the chamber floor but me?“

„No one,“ answered Edward, raising himself on his elbow; „dear brother, lay aside thy weapon, say thy prayers, and lay thee down to rest.“

While he thus spoke, the Spirit smiled at Halbert as if in scorn; her wan cheek faded in the wan moonlight even before the smile had passed away, and Halbert himself no longer beheld the vision to which he had so anxiously solicited his brother's attention. „May God preserve my wits!“ he said, as, laying aside his weapon, he again threw himself on his bed.

„Amen! my dearest brother,“ answered Edward; „but we must not provoke that heaven in our wantonness which we invoke in our misery. — Be not angry with me, my dear brother — I know not why you have totally of late estranged yourself from me — It is true, I am neither so athletic in body, nor so alert in courage, as you have been from your infancy; yet, till lately, you have not absolutely cast off my society — Believe me, I have wept in secret, though I forbore to intrude myself on your privacy. The time has been when you held me not so cheap; and when, if I could not follow the game so closely, or mark it so truly as you, I could fill up our intervals of pastime with pleasant tales of the olden times, which I had read or heard, and which excited even your attention as we sate and eat our provision by some pleasant spring — but now I have, though I know not why, lost thy regard and affection. Nay, toss not thy arms about thee thus wildly,“ said the younger brother; „from thy strange dreams, I fear some touch of fever hath affected thy blood — let me draw closer around thee thy mantle.“

„Forbear,“ said Halbert — „your care is needless — your complaints are without reason — your fears on my account are in vain.“

„Nay, but hear me, brother,“ said Edward. „Your speech in sleep, and now even your waking dreams, are of beings which belong not to this world or to our race — Our good Father Eustace says, that howbeit we may not do well to receive all idle tales of goblins and spectres, yet there is warrant from holy Scripture to believe, that the fiends haunt waste and solitary places; and that those who frequent such wildernesses alone, are the prey, or the sport of these wandering demons. And therefore, I pray thee, brother, let me go with you when you go next up the glen, where, as you well know, there be places of evil reputation — Thou carest not for my escort. but, Halbert, such dangers are more safely encountered by the wise in judgment, than by the bold in bosom; and though I have small cause to boast of my own wisdom, yet I have that which ariseth from the written knowledge of elder times.“

There was a moment during this discourse, when Halbert had well nigh come to the resolution of disburhening his own breast, by entrusting Edward with all that weighed upon it. But when his brother reminded him that this was the morning of a high holiday, and that, setting aside all other business or pleasure, he ought to go to the Monastery and shrive himself before Father Eustace, who would that day occupy the confessional, pride stepped in and confirmed his wavering resolution. „I will not avow,“ he thought, „a tale so extraordinary, that I may be considered as an impostor or something worse — I will not fly from this Englishman, whose arm and sword may be no better than my own. My fathers have faced his betters, were he as much distinguished in battle as he is by his quaint discourse.“

Pride, which has been said to save man, and woman too, from falling, has yet a stronger influence on the mind when it embraces the cause of passion, and seldom fails to render it victorious over conscience and reason. His mind once determined, though to the worsser course, Halbert at length slept soundly, and was only awakened by the dawn of day.

CHAPTER VIII.

Indifferent, but indifferent—pshaw, he doth it not Like one who is his craft's master—ne'er the less
I have seen a clown confer a bloody coxcomb,
On one who was a master of defence.

Old Play.

WITH the first grey peep of dawn, Halbert Glendinning arose and hastened to dress himself, girded on his weapon, and took a cross-bow in his hand, as if his usual sport had been his sole object. He groped his way down the dark and winding staircase, and undid, with as little noise as possible, the fastenings of the inner door, and of the exterior iron grate. At length he stood free in the court-yard, and looking up to the tower, saw a signal made with a handkerchief from the window. Nothing doubting that it was his antagonist, he paused expecting him. But it was Mary Avenel, who glided like a spirit from under the low and rugged portal.

Halbert was much surprised, and felt, he knew not why, like one caught in the act of a meditated trespass. The presence of Mary Avenel had till that moment never given him pain. She spoke too in a tone where sorrow seemed to mingle with reproach, while she asked him with emphasis, „What he was about to do?“

He shewed his cross-bow, and was about to express the pretext he had meditated, when Mary interrupted him.

„Not so, Halbert — that evasion were unworthy of one whose word has hitherto been truth. You meditate not the destruction of the deer — your hand and your heart are aimed at other game — you seek to do battle with this stranger.“

„And wherefore should I quarrel with our guest?“ answered Halbert, blushing deeply.

„There are, indeed, many reasons why you should not,“ replied the maiden, „nor is there one of avail wherefore you should — yet, nevertheless, such a quarrel you are now searching after.“

„Why should you suppose so, Mary?“ said Halbert, endeavouring to hide his conscious purpose,—„he is my mother's guest—he is protected by the Abbot and the community, who are our masters — he is of high degree also, and wherefore should you think that I can, or dare, resent a hasty word, which he has perchance thrown out against me more from the wantonness of his wit, than the purpose of his heart?“

„Alas!“ answered the maiden, „the very asking that question puts your resolution beyond a doubt. Since your childhood you were ever daring, seeking danger rather than avoiding it—delighting in whatever had the air of adventure and of courage; and it is not from fear that you will now blench from your purpose — O let it then be from pity!—from pity, Halbert, to your aged mother, whom your death or victory will alike deprive of the comfort and stay of her age.“

„She has my brother Edward,“ said Halbert, turning suddenly from her.

„She has indeed,“ said Mary Avenel, „the calm, the noble-minded, the considerate Edward, who has thy courage, Halbert, without thy fiery rashness, — thy generous spirit, with more of reason to guide it. He would not have heard his mother, would not have heard his adopted sister, beseech him in vain not to ruin himself, and tear up their future hopes of happiness and protection.“

Halbert's heart swelled as he replied to this reproach, „Well—what avails it speaking?—you have him that is better than me — wiser, more considerate,—braver for aught that I know — you are provided with a protector, and need care no more for me“

Again he turned to depart, but Mary Avenel laid her hand on his arm so gently that he scarce felt her hold, yet felt that it was impossible for him to strike it off. There he stood, one foot advanced to leave the court-yard, but so little determined on departure, that he resembled a traveller arrested by the spell of a magician, and unable either to quit the attitude of motion, or to proceed on his course.

Mary Avenel availed herself of his state of suspense „Hear me,“ she said, „hear me, Halbert — I am an orphan, and even Heaven hears the orphan—I have been the companion of your infancy, and if you will not hear me for an instant, from whom may Mary Avenel claim so poor a boon?"

„I hear you," said Halbert Glendinning, „but be brief, dear Mary—you mistake the nature of my business — it is but a morning of summer sport which we propose."

„Say not thus," said the maiden, interrupting him, „say not thus to me — others thou may'st deceive, but me thou canst not — There has been that in me from the earliest youth, which fraud flies from, and which imposture cannot deceive. For what fate has given me such a power I know not; but, bred an ignorant maiden in this sequestered valley, mine eyes can too often see what man would most willingly hide — I can judge of the dark purpose, †though it is hid under the smiling brow, and a glance of the eye says more to me than oaths and protestations do to others."

„Then," said Halbert, „if thou canst so read the human heart, — say, dear Mary — what doest thou see in mine?—tell me that — say that what thou seest — what thou readest in this bosom, does not offend thee — say but that, and thou shalt be the guide of my actions, and mould me now and henceforward to honour or to dishonour at thy own free will."

Mary Avenel became first red, and then deadly pale, as Halbert Glendinning spoke. But when, turning round at the close of his address, he took her hand, she gently withdrew it, and replied, „I cannot read the heart, Halbert, and I would not of my will know aught of yours, save what beseems us both—I only can judge of signs, words, and actions of little outward import, more truly than those around me, as my eyes, thou knowest, have seen objects not presented to those of others.“

„Let them gaze then on one whom they shall never see more,“ said Halbert, once more turning from her, and rushing out of the courtyard without again looking back.

Mary Avenel gave a faint scream, and clasped both her hands firmly on her forehead and eyes. She had been a minute in this attitude, when she was thus greeted by a voice from behind: „Generously done, my most clement Discretion, to hide those brilliant eyes from the far inferior beams which even now begin to gild the eastern horizon — Certes, peril there were that Phoebus, outshone in splendour, might in very shamefacednes turn back his car, and rather leave the world in darkness, than incur the disgrace of such an encounter — Credit me, lovely Discretion —“

But as Sir Piercie Shafton (the reader will readily set down these flowers of eloquence to the proper owner,) attempted to take Mary Avenel's hand, in order to proceed in his speech, she shook him abruptly off, and regarding him with an eye which evinced terror and agitation, rushed past him into the tower.

The knight stood looking after her with a countenance in which contempt was strongly mingled with mortification. „By my knighthood!“ he ejaculated, „I have thrown away upon this rude rustic Phidelé a speech which the proudest beauty at the court of Felicia (so let me call the Elysium from which I am banished!) might have termed the very mattins of Cupid. Hard and inexorable was the fate that sent thee hither, Piercie Shafton, to waste thy wit upon country wenches, and thy valour upon hob-nailed clowns! But that insult—that affront—had it been offered to me by the lowest plebeian, he must have died for it by my hand, in respect the enormity of the offence doth countervail the inequality of him by whom it was given. I trust I shall find this clownish roisterer not less willing to deal in blows than in taunts.“

While he held this conversation with himself, Sir Piercie Shafton was hastening to the little tuft of birch trees which had been assigned as the place of meeting. He greeted his antagonist with a courtly salutation, followed by this commentary: „I pray you to observe, that I doff my hat to you, though so much my inferior in rank, without derogation on my part, inasmuch as my having so far honoured you in receiving and admitting your defiance, doth, in the judgment of the best martialists, in some sort and for the time, raise you to a level with me — an honour which you may and ought to account cheaply purchased, even with the loss of your life, if such should chance to be the issue of this duello.“

„For which condescension,“ said Halbert, „I have to thank the token which I presented to you.“

The knight changed colour, and grinded his teeth with rage—„Draw your weapon!“ said he to Glendinning.

„Not in this spot,“ answered the youth; „we would be liable to interruption—Follow me, and I will bring you to a place where we will encounter no such risk."

He proceeded to walk up the glen, resolving that their place of combat should be in the entrance of the Corri-nan-shian, both because the spot, lying under the reputation of being haunted was very little frequented, and also because he regarded it as a place which to him might be termed fated, and which he therefore resolved should witness his death or victory.

They walked up the glen for some time in silence, like honourable enemies who did not wish to contend with words, and who had nothing friendly to exchange with each other. Silence, however, was always an irksome state with Sir Piercie, and, moreover, his anger was usually a hasty and short lived passion. As, therefore, he went forth, in his own idea, in all love and honour towards his antagonist, he saw not any cause for submitting longer to the painful restraint of positive silence. He began by complimenting Halbert on the alert activity with which he surmounted the obstacles and impediments of the way.

"Trust me," said he, "worthy rustic, we have not a lighter or a firmer step in our court-like revels, and if duly set forth by a silk hose, and trained unto that stately exercise, your leg would make an indifferent good shew in a pavin or a galliard. And I doubt nothing," he added, "that you have availed yourself of some opportunity to improve yourself in the art of fence, which is more a kin than dancing to our present purpose?"

"I know nothing more of fencing," said Hal-bert, „than hath been taught me by an old shepherd of ours, called Martin, and at whiles a lesson from Christie of the Clinthil—for the rest, I must trust to good sword, strong arm, and sound heart.“

„Marry and I am glad of it, young Audacity, (I will call you my Audacity, and you may call me your Condescension, while we are on these terms of unnatural equality,) I am glad of your ignorance with all my heart. For we martialists proportion the punishment which we inflict upon our opposites, to the length and hazard of the efforts wherewith they oppose themselves to us. And I see not why you, being but a tyro, may not be held sufficiently punished for your outrecuidance and orgulous presumption, by the loss of an ear, an eye, or even of a finger, accompanied by some flesh-wound of depth and severity, suited to your error—whereas, had you been able to stand more effectually on your defence, I see not how less than your life could have atoned sufficiently for your presumption.“

„Now, by God and Our Lady,“ said Halbert, unable any longer to restrain himself, „thou art thyself over presumptuous, who speakest thus daringly of the issue of a combat which is not yet even begun - Are you a god, that you already dispose over my life and limbs? or are you a judge on the justice-air, telling at your ease and without risk, how the head and quarters of a condemned criminal are to be disposed of?“

„Not so, O thou, whom I have well permitted to call thyself my Audacity! I, thy Condescension, am neither a god to judge the issue of the combat before it is fought, nor a judge to dispose at my ease and in safety of the limbs and head of a condemned criminal; but I am an indifferent good master of fence, being the first pupil of the first master of the first school of fence that our royal England affords, the said master being no other than the truly noble, and all-unutterably-skilful Vicentio Saviola, from whom I learned the firm step, quick eye, and nimble hand—of which qualities thou, O my most rustic Audacity, art full like to reap the fruits so soon as we shall reach a place of ground fitting for such experiments.“

They had now reached the gorge of the ravine where Halbert had at first intended to stop; but when he observed the narrowness of the level ground, he began to consider that it was only by superior agility that he could expect to make up his deficiency in the science, as it was called, of defence. He found no spot which afforded sufficient room to traverse for this purpose, until he reached the well known fountain, by whose margin, and in front of the huge rock from which it sprung, was an amphitheatre of level turf, of small space indeed, compared with the great height of the cliffs with which it was surrounded on every point save that from which the rivulet issued forth, yet large enough for their present purpose.

When they had reached this spot of ground, fitted well by its gloom and sequestered situation to be a scene of mortal strife, both were surprised to observe that a grave was dug close by the foot of the rock with great neatness and regularity, the green turf being laid down upon the one side, and the earth thrown out in a heap upon the other. A mattock and shovel lay by the verge of the grave.
the

Sir Piercie Shafton bent his eye with unusual seriousness upon Halbert Glendinning, as he asked him sternly, „Does this bode treason, young man? And have you purpose to set upon me here as in an emboscata or place of vantage?“

„Not on my part, by heaven!“ answered the youth; „I told no one of our purpose, nor would I for the throne of Scotland take odds against a single arm.“

„I believe thou wouldst not, mine Audacity,“ said the knight, resuming the affected manner which was become a second nature to him; „nevertheless this fosse is curiously well shaped, and might be the master-piece of Nature’s last bed-maker. I would say the sexton — Wherefore let us be thankful to chance, or some unknown friend, who hath thus provided for one of us the decencies of sepulture, and let us proceed to determine which shall have the advantage of enjoying this place of undisturbed slumber.“

So saying, he stripped off his doublet and cloak, which he folded up with great care, and deposited upon a large stone, while Halbert Glendinning, not without some emotion, followed his example. Their vicinity to the favourite haunt of the White Lady led him to form conjectures concerning [the incident of the grave — “It must have been her work!“ he thought: „the Spirit foresaw and has provided for the fatal event of the combat—I must return from this place a homicide, or I must remain here for ever!“

The bridge seemed now broken down behind him, and the chance of coming off honourably without killing or being killed, (the hope of which issue has cheered the sinking heart of many a duelist,) seemed not to be altogether removed. Yet the very desperation of his situation gave him, on an instant's reflection, both firmness and courage, and presented to him one sole alternative, conquest, namely, or death.

„As we are here,“ Said Sir Piercie Shafton, „unaccompanied by any patrons or seconds, it were well you should pass your hands over my side, as I shall over yours; not that I suspect you to use any quaint device of privy armour, but in order to comply with the ancient and laudable custom practised on all such occasions.“

While, complying with his antagonist's humour, Halbert Glendinning went through this ceremony, Sir Piercie Shafton did not fail to solicit his attention to the quality and fineness of his wrought and embroidered shirt — „In this very shirt,“ said he, „O mine Audacity! — I say in this very garment, in which I am now to combat a Scottish rustic like thyself, it was my envied lot to lead the winning party at that wondrous match at ballon, made betwixt the divine Astrophel, (our matchless Sidney,) and the right honourable my very good lord of Oxford. All the beauties of Felicia, (by which name I distinguish our beloved England,) stood in the gallery, waving their kerchiefs at each turn of the game, and cheering the winners by their plaudits. After which noble sport we were refreshed by a suitable banquet, whereat it pleased the noble Urania, (being the unmatched Countess of Pembroke,) to accommodate me with her own fan for the cooling my somewhat too much inflamed visage, to requite which courtesy, I said, casting my features into a smiling yet melancholy fashion; O divinest Urania! receive again that too fatal gift, which not like the Zephyr cooleth, but like the hot breath of the Sirocco heateth yet more that which is already inflamed. Whereupon looking upon me somewhat scornfully, yet not so but what the experienced courtier might perceive a certain cast of approbative affection"—

Here the knight was interrupted by Halbert, who had waited with courteous patience for some little time, till he found, that far from drawing to a close, Sir Piercie seemed rather inclined to wax prolix in his reminiscences.

„Sir Knight,“ said the youth, „if this matter be not very much to the purpose, we will, if you object not, proceed to that which we have in hand. You should have abidden in England had you desired to waste time in words, for here we spend it in blows.“

„I crave your pardon, most rusticated Audacity,“ answered Sir Piercie; „truly I become oblivious of every thing beside, when the recollections of the divine court of Felicia press upon my weakened memory, even as a saint is dazzled when he bethinks him of the beatific vision. Ah felicitous Feliciana! delicate nurse of the fair, chosen abode of the wise, the birthplace and cradle of nobility, the temple of courtesy, the fane of sprightly chivalry — Ah heavenly court, or rather courtly heaven! cheered with dances, lulled asleep with harmony, wakened with sprightly sports and tourneys, decored with silks and tissues, glittering with diamonds and jewels, standing on end with double-piled velvets, satins, and satinettas!“

„The token, Sir Knight, the token!“ exclaimed Halbert Glendinning, who, impatient of Sir Piercie's interminable oratory, reminded him of the ground of their quarrel, as the best way to compel him to the purpose of their meeting.

And he judged right for Sir Piercie Shafton no sooner heard him speak, than he exclaimed, „Thy death-hour has struck—betake thee to thy sword—Via!“

Both swords were unsheathed, and the combatants commenced their engagement. Halbert felt immediately that, as he had expected, he was far inferior to his adversary in the management of his weapon. Sir Piercie Shafton had taken no more than his own share of real merit, when he termed himself an absolutely good fencer; and Glendinning soon felt that he would have great difficulty in escaping with life and honour from such a master of the sword. The English knight was master of all the mystery of the stoccata, imbrocata, puntoreverso, incartata, and so forth, which the Italian masters of defence had lately introduced into general practice. But Glendinning, on his part, was no novice in the principles of the art, according to the old Scottish fashion, and possessed the first of all qualities, a steady and collected disposition. At first, being desirous to try the skill, and become acquainted with the play of his enemy, he stood on his defence, keeping his foot, hand, eye, and body in perfect unison, and holding his sword short, and with the point towards his antagonist's face, so that Sir Piercie, in order to assail him, was obliged to make actual passes, and could not avail himself of his skill in making feints; while, on the other hand, Halbert was prompt to parry these attacks, either by shifting his ground or with the sword. The consequence was, that after two or three sharp attempts on the part of Sir Piercie, which were evaded or disconcerted by the address of his antagonist, he began to assume the defensive in his turn, fearful of giving some advantage by being repeatedly the assailant. But Halbert Glendinning was too cautious to press on an antagonist whose dexterity had already more than once placed him within a hair's-breadth of death, which he had only escaped by uncommon watchfulness and agility.

When each had made a feint or two, there was therefore a pause in the conflict, both as if by one assent dropping their sword's point, and looking on each other for a moment without speaking. At length Halbert Glendinning, who felt perhaps more uneasy on account of his family, than he had done before he had displayed his own courage, and proved the strength of his antagonist, could not help saying, „Is the subject of our quarrel, Sir Knight, so mortal, that one of our two bodies must needs fill up that grave?— or may we with honour, having proved ourselves against each other, sheathe our swords and depart friends?“

„Valiant and most rustical Audacity,“ said the Southron Knight, „to no man of earth could you have put a question on the code of honour, who was more capable of rendering you a reason.“
Let us pause for the space of one venue, until

I give you my opinion on this dependence;* for certain it is, that brave men should not run upon their fate like brute and furious wild beasts, but should slay each other deliberately, decently, and with reason. Therefore, if we coolly examine the state of our dependence, we may the better apprehend whether the sisters three have doomed one of us to expiate the same with his blood—Dost thou understand me?"

„I have heard Father Eustace," said Halbert, after a moment's recollection, „Speak of the three furies, with their thread and their shears."

„Enough—enough,"—interrupted Sir Piercie Shafton, crimson with a new fit of rage, „the thread of thy life is spun!"

And with these words he attacked with the utmost ferocity the Scottish youth, who had but just time to throw himself into a posture of defence. But the rash fury of the assailant, as frequently happens, disappointed its own purpose; for, as he made a desperate thrust, Halbert Glendinning avoided it, and, ere the knight could recover his weapon, requited him (to use his own language) with a resolute stoccata, which passed through his body, and Sir Piercie Shafton fell to the ground.

* Dependence — A phrase among the brethren of the sword for an existing quarrel.

CHAPTER IX.

Yes, life hath left him—every busy thought,
Each fiery passion, every strong affection,
The sense of outward ill and inward sorrow,
Are fled at once from the pale trunk before me;
And I have given that which spoke and moved,
Thought, acted, suffered as a living man,
To be a ghastly form of bloody clay,
Soon the foul food for reptiles,

Old Play.

I BELIEVE few successful duellists (if the word successful can be applied to a superiority so fatal,) have beheld their dead antagonist stretched on the earth at their feet, without wishing they could redeem with their own blood that which it has been their fate to spill. Least of all could such indifference be the lot of so young a man as Halbert Glendinning, who, unused to the sight of human blood, was not only struck with sorrow, but with terror, when he beheld Sir Piercie Shafton lie stretched on the green-sward before him, vomiting gore as if impelled by the strokes of a pump. He threw his bloody sword on the ground, and hastened to kneel down and support him, vainly striving, at the same time, to staunch his wound, which seemed rather to bleed inwardly than externally.

The unfortunate knight spoke at intervals, when the syncope would permit him, and his words, so far as intelligible, partook of his affect and conceited, yet not ungenerous character.

„Most rustical youth,“ he said, „thy fortune hath prevailed over knightly skill—and Audacity hath overcome Condensation, even as the kite hath sometimes hawked at and struck down the falcon gentle. — Fly and save thyself! — Take my purse — it is in the nether pocket of my carnation-coloured hose — and is worth a clown’s acceptance, — See that my mails, with my vestments, be sent to the Monastery of Saint Mary’s — (here his voice grew weak, and his mind and recollection seemed to waver) — I bestow the cut velvet jerkin, with close breeches conforming — for—oh!—the good of my soul.“

„Be of good comfort, sir,“ said Halbert, half-distracted with his agony of pity and remorse, „I trust you shall yet do well—O for a leach!“

„Were there twenty physicians, O most generous Audacity, and that were a grave spectacle — I might not survive — my life is ebbing fast, — Commend me to the rustical nymph whom I called my Discretion — O Claridiana! — true empress of this bleeding heart — which now bleedeth in sad earnest! — Place me on the ground at my length, most rustical victor, born to quench the pride of the burning light of the felicitous court of Feliciania — O saints and angels — knights and ladies — masques and theatres — quaint devices — chain-work and broidery — love, honour, and beauty!“ —

While muttering these last words, which slid from him, as it were unawares, while doubtless he was recalling to mind the glories of the English court, the gallant Sir Piercie Shafton stretched out his limbs—groaned deeply, shut his eyes, and became motionless.

The victor tore his hair for very sorrow, as he looked on the pale countenance of his victim. Life, he thought, had not utterly fled, but without better aid than his own, he saw not how it could be preserved.

„Why,“ he exclaimed in vain penitence, „why did I provoke him to an issue so fatal! Would to God I had submitted to the worst insult man could receive from man, rather than be the bloody instrument of this bloody deed—and doubly cursed be this evil-boding spot, which, haunted as I knew it to be by a witch or a devil, I yet chose for the place of combat! In any other place, save this, there had been help to be gotten by speed of foot, or by uplifting of voice—but here there is no one to be found by search, no one to hear my shouts, save the evil spirit who has counselled this mischief. It is not her hour—I will essay the spell howsoever; and if she can give me aid, she shall do it, or know of what a madman is capable even against those of another world!“

He spurned his bloody shoe from his foot, and repeated the spell with which the reader is well acquainted; but there was neither voice, apparition, nor signal of answer. The youth, in the impatience of his despair, and with the rash hardihood which formed the basis of his character, shouted aloud, „Witch—Sorceress—Fiend!—art thou deaf to my cries of help, and so ready to appear and answer those of vengeance? Arise and speak to me, or I will choke up thy fountain, tear down thy hollybush, and leave thy haunt as waste and bare, as thy fatal assistance has made me waste of comfort and bare of counsel!“ — This furious and raving invocation was suddenly interrupted by a distant sound, resembling a hollo, from the gorge of the ravine. „Now may Saint Mary be praised,“ said the youth, hastily fastening his sandal, „I hear the voice of some living man, who may give me counsel and help in this fearful extremity.“

Having donned his sandal, Halbert Glendinning hallooing at intervals, in answer to the sound which he had heard, ran with the speed of a hunted buck down the rugged defile, as if paradise had been before him, hell and all her furies behind, and his eternal happiness or misery had depended upon the speed which he exerted. In a space incredibly short for any one but a Scottish mountaineer having his nerves strung by the deepest and most passionate interest, the youth reached the entrance of the ravine, through which the rill that flows down Corri-nan-shian discharges itself, and unites with the brook that waters the little valley of Glendearg.

Here he paused and looked around him upwards and downwards through the glen, without perceiving a human form. His heart sank within him. But the windings of the glen intercepted his prospect, and the person, whose voice he had heard, might, therefore, be at no great distance, though not obvious to his sight. The branches of an oak tree, which shot straight out from the face of a tall cliff, proffered to his bold spirit, steady head, and active limbs, the means of ascending it as a place of out-look, although the enterprize was what most men would have shrunk from. But by one bound from the earth, the active youth caught hold of the lower branch and swung himself up into the tree, and in a minute more gained the top of the cliff, from which he could easily descry a human figure descending the valley. It was not that of a shepherd, or of a hunter, and scarce any others used to traverse this deserted solitude, especially coming from the north, since the reader may remember that the brook took its rise from an extensive and dangerous morass which lay in that direction.

But Halbert Glendinning did not pause to consider who the traveller might be, or what might be the purpose of his journey. To know that he saw a human being, and might receive, in the extremity of his distress, the countenance and advice of a fellow-creature, was enough for him at the moment. He threw himself from the cliff once more into the arms of the projecting oak tree, whose boughs waved in middle air, anchored by the roots in a huge rift, or chasm of the rock. Catching at the branch which was nearest to him, he dropped himself from that height upon the ground; and such was the athletic springiness of his youthful sinews, that he pitched there as lightly, and with as little injury as the falcon stooping from her wheel.

To resume his race at full speed up the glen, was the work of an instant; and, as he turned angle after angle of the indented banks of the valley, without meeting that which he sought, he became half afraid that the form which he had seen at such a distance had already melted into thin air, and was either a deception of his own imagination, or of the elementary spirits, by which the valley was supposed to be haunted.

But, to his inexpressible joy, as he turned around the base of a huge and distinguished crag, he saw, straight before and very near to him, a person, whose dress, as he viewed it hastily, resembled that of a pilgrim.

He was a man in advanced life, and wearing a long beard, having on his head a large slouched hat, without either band or broach. His dress was a tunic of black serge, which, like those commonly called hussar-cloaks, had an upper part which covered the arms and fell down on the lower; a small scrip and bottle, which hung at his back, with a stout staff in his hand, completed his equipage. His step was feeble, like that of one exhausted by a toilsome journey.

„Save ye, good father!“ said the youth. „God and Our Lady have sent you to my assistance.“

„And in what, my son, can so frail a creature as I am be of service to you?“ said the old man, not a little surprised at being thus accosted by so handsome a youth, his features discomposed by anxiety, his face flushed with exertion, his hands and much of his dress stained with blood.

„A man bleeds to death in the valley here, hard by. Come with me — come with me! You are aged — you have experience — you have at least your senses — and mine have well nigh left me.“

„A man — and bleeding to death — and here in this desolate spot?“ said the stranger.

„Stay not to question it, father,“ said the youth, „but come instantly to his rescue. Follow me—follow me, without an instant's delay.“

„Nay, but my son,“ said the old man, „we do not thus lightly follow the guides who present themselves thus suddenly in the bosom of a howling wilderness. Ere I follow thee, thou must expound to me thy name, thy purpose, and the cause.“

„There is no time to expound anything,“ said Halbert; „I tell thee a man's life is at stake, and thou must come to aid him, or I will carry thee thither by force!“

„Nay, thou shalt not need,“ said the traveller; „if it indeed be as thou sayest, I will follow thee of free-will—the rather that I am not wholly unskilled in leach-craft, and have in my scrip that which may do thy friend a service—Yet walk more slowly, I pray thee, for I am already well nigh forespent with travel.“

With the indignant impatience of the fiery steed when compelled by his rider to keep pace with some slow drudge upon the highway, Halbert accompanied the wayfarer, burning with anxiety which he endeavoured to subdue, that he might not alarm his companion, who was obviously afraid to trust him. When they reached the place where they were to turn off the wider glen into the Corri, the traveller made a doubtful pause as if unwilling to leave the broader path—„Young man,“ he said, „if thou meanest aught but good to these grey hairs, thou wilt gain little by thy cruelty—I have no earthly treasure to tempt either robber or murderer.“

„And I,“ said the youth, „am neither—and yet—God of Heaven! I may be a murderer, unless your aid comes in time to this wounded wretch!"

„Is it even so?“ said the traveller; „and do human passions disturb the breast of nature even in her deepest solitude? — Yet why should I marvel that were darkness abides the works of darkness should abound? — By its fruits is the tree known.—Lead on, unhappy youth—I follow thee!“

And with better will to the journey than he had evinced hitherto, the stranger exerted himself to the uttermost, and seemed to forget his own fatigue in his efforts to keep pace with his impatient guide.

What was the surprise of Halbert Glendinning, when, upon arriving at the fatal spot, he saw no appearance of the body of Sir Piercie Shafton! The traces of the fray were otherwise sufficiently visible. The knight's cloak had indeed vanished as well as the body, but his doublet remained where he had laid it down, and the turf on which he had been stretched was stained with blood in many a dark crimson spot.

As he gazed round him in terror and astonishment, Halbert's eyes fell upon the place of sepulture which had so lately appeared to gape for a victim. It was no longer open, and it seemed that earth had received the expected tenant; for the usual narrow hillock was piled over what had lately been an open grave, and the green sod was adjusted over all with the accuracy of an experienced sexton. Halbert stood aghast. The idea rushed on his mind irresistibly, that the earthheap before him enclosed what had lately been a living, moving, and sentient fellow-creature, whom, on little provocation, his fell act had reduced to a clod of the valley, as senseless and as cold as the turf under which he rested. The hand that scooped the grave had completed its work; and whose hand could it be save that of the mysterious being of doubtful quality, whom his rashness had invoked, and whom he had suffered to intermingle in his destinies?

As he stood with clasped hands and uplifted eyes, bitterly rueing his rashness, he was roused by the voice of the stranger, whose suspicions of his guide had again been awakened, by finding the scene so different from what Halbert had led him to expect — „Young man,“ he said, „hast thou baited thy tongue with falsehood, to cut perhaps only a few days from the life of one whom Nature will soon call home, without guilt on thy part to hasten his journey?“

„By the blessed Heaven! — by our dear Lady!“ ejaculated Halbert —

„Swear not at all!“ said the stranger, interrupting him, „neither by Heaven, for it is God’s throne — nor by earth, for it is his footstool — nor by the creatures whom he hath made, for they are but earth and clay as we are. Let thy yea be yea, and thy nay nay. Tell me in a word, why and for what purpose thou hast feigned a tale, to lead a bewildered traveller yet farther astray?“

„As I am a Christian man,“ said Glendinning, „I left him here bleeding to death — and now I nowhere spy him, and much I doubt that the tomb that thou seest has closed on his mortal remains!“

„And who is he for whose fate thou art so anxious?“ said the stranger: „or how is it possible that this wounded man could have been either removed from, or interred in, a place so solitary?“

„His name,“ said Halbert, after a moment's pause, „is Piercie Shafton — there, on that very spot, I left him bleeding; and what power has conveyed him hence, I know no more than thou doest.“

„Piercie Shafton?“ said the stranger, „Sir Piercie Shafton of Wilverton, a kinsman, as it is said, of the great Piercie of Northumberland? If thou hast slain him, to return to the territories of the proud Abbot is to give thy neck to the gallows. He is well known that Piercie Shafton; the meddling tool of wiser plotters—a hair-brained trafficker in treason—a champion of the Pope, employed as a forlorn hope by those more politic heads, who have more will to work mischief than valour to encounter danger. — Come with me, youth, and save thyself from the evil consequences of this deed — guide me to the castle of Avenel, and thy reward shall be protection and safety.“

Again Halbert paused, and summoned his mind to a hasty council, The vengeance with which the Abbot was likely to visit the slaughter of Shafton, his friend and in some measure his guest, was likely to be severe; yet, in the various contingencies which he had considered previous to their duel, he had unaccountably omitted to reflect what was to be his line of conduct in case of Sir Piercie falling by his hand. If he returned to Glendearg, he was sure to draw on his

his whole family, including Mary Avenel, the resentment of the Abbot and community; whereas it was possible that flight might make him regarded as the sole author of the deed, and might avert the indignation of the Monks from the rest of the inhabitants of his paternal tower. Halbert recollected also the favour expressed for the household, and especially for Edward, by the Sub-Prior; and he conceived that he could, by communicating his own guilt to that worthy ecclesiastic, when at a distance from Glendearg, secure his powerful interposition in favour of his family. These thoughts rapidly passed through his mind, and he determined on flight. The stranger's company and his promised protection came in aid of that resolution; but he was unable to reconcile the invitation which the old man gave him to accompany him for safety to the castle of Avenel, with the connections of Julian, the present usurper of that inheritance. „Good father,“ he said, „I fear that you mistake the man with whom you wish me to harbour. Avenel guided Piercie Shafton into Scotland, and his hench-man, Christie of the Clinthill, brought the southron hither.“

„Of that,“ said the old man, „I am well aware. Yet if thou wilt trust to me, as I have shewn no reluctance to confide in thee, thou shalt find with Julian Avenel welcome, or at least safety.“

„Father,“ replied Halbert, „though I can ill reconcile what thou sayest to what Julian Avenel hath done, yet caring little about the safety of a creature so lost as myself, and as thy words seem those of truth and honesty, and finally as thou didst render thyself frankly up to my conduct, I will return the confidence thou hast shewn, and accompany thee to the castle of Avenel by a road which thou thyself couldst never have discovered." He led the way, and the old man followed for some time in silence.

CHAPTER X.

'Tis when the wound is stiffening with the cold,
The warrior first feels pain — 'tis when the heat
And fiery fever of his soul is passed,
The sinner feels remorse.

Old Play.

THE feelings of compunction with which Halbert Glendinning was visited upon this painful occasion, were deeper than belonged to an age and country in which human life was held so cheap. They fell far short certainly of those which might have afflicted a mind regulated by better religious precepts, and more strictly trained under social laws; but still they were deep and severely felt, and divided in Halbert's heart even the regret with which he parted from Mary Avenel and the tower of his fathers. The old traveller walked silently by his side for some time, and then addressed him. — „My son, it has been said that sorrow must speak or die. — Why art thou so much cast down? — Tell me thy unhappy tale, and it may be that my grey head may devise counsel and aid for your young life.“

„Alas!“ said Halbert Glendinning, „can you wonder why I am cast down? — I am at this instant a fugitive from my father's house, from my mother, and from my friends, and I bear on my head the blood of a man who injured me but in idle words, which I have thus bloodily requited. My heart now tells me I have done evil — it were harder than these rocks if it could bear unmoved the thought, that I have sent this man to a long account, unhouseled and unshriev-ed!“

„Pause there, my son,“ said the traveller. „That thou hast defaced God's image in thy neighbour's person — that thou hast sent dust to dust in idle wrath or idler pride, is indeed a sin of the deepest dye — that thou hast cut short the space which Heaven might have allowed him for repentance, makes it yet more deadly — but for all this there is balm in Gilead.“

„I understand you not, father,“ said Halbert, struck by the solemn tone which was assumed by his companion.

The old man proceeded. „Thou hast slain thine enemy — it was a cruel deed: thou hast cut him off perchance in his sins — it is a fearful aggravation. Do yet by my counsel, and in lieu of him whom thou hast perchance consigned to the kingdom of Satan, let thine efforts wrest another subject from the reign of the Evil One.“

„I understand you, father,“ said Halbert; „thou would'st have me atone for my rashness by doing service to the soul of my adversary — But how may this be? I have no money to purchase masses, and gladly would I go barefoot to the Holy Land to free his spirit from Purgatory, only that “ —

„My son,“ said the old man, interrupting him, „the sinner for whose redemption I entreat you to labour, is not the dead but the living. It is not for the soul of thine enemy I would exhort thee to pray — that has already had its final doom from a Judge as merciful as he is just; nor, wert thou to coin that rock into ducats, and obtain a mass for each one, would it avail the departed spirit. Where the tree hath fallen, it must lie. But the sapling which hath in it yet the vigour and juice of life, may be bended to the point to which it ought to incline.“

„Art thou a priest, father,“ said the young man, „or by what commission dost thou talk of such high matters?“

„By that of my Almighty Master,“ said the traveller, „under whose banner I am an enlisted soldier“

Halbert's acquaintance with religious matters was no deeper than could be derived from the Archbishop of St Andrews' Catechism, and the pamphlet called the Twa-pennie Faith, both which were industriously circulated and recommended by the Monks of St Mary's. Yet, however indifferent and superficial a theologian, he began to suspect that he was now in company with one of the gossellers, or heretics, before whose influence the ancient system of religion now tottered to the very foundation. Bred up, as may well be presumed, in a holy horror against these formidable sectaries, the youth's first feelings were those of a loyal and devoted church vassal. „Old man,“ he said, „wert thou able to make good with thy hand the words that thy tongue hath spoken against our Holy Mother Church, we should have tried upon this moor which of our creeds hath the better champion."

„Nay," said the stranger, „if thou art a true soldier of Rome, thou wilt not pause from thy purpose because thou hast the odds of years and of strength on thy side. Hearken to me, my son. I have shewed thee how to make thy peace with heaven, and thou hast rejected my proffer. I will now shew thee how thou shalt make thy reconciliation with the powers of this world. Take this grey head from the frail body which supports it, and carry it to the chair of proud Abbot Boniface; and when thou tellest him thou hast slain Piercie Shafton, and his ire rises at the deed, lay the head of Henry Warden at his foot, and thou shalt have praise instead of censure."

Halbert Glendinning stepped back in surprise. „What! are you that Henry Warden so famous among the heretics, that even Knox's name is scarce more frequently in their mouths? Art thou he, and darest thou to approach the Halidome of Saint Mary's?"

„I am Henry Warden of a surety," said the old man, „far unworthy to be named in the same breath with Knox, but yet willing to venture on whatever dangers my Master's service may call me to."

„Hearken to me then," said Halbert; „to slay thee, I have no heart — to make thee prisoner, were equally to bring thy blood on my head — to leave thee in this wild without a guide, were little better. I will conduct thee, as I promised, in safety to the castle of Avenel; but breathe not, while we are on the journey, a word against the doctrines of the holy church of which I am an unworthy — but though an ignorant, a zealous member. — When thou art there arrived, beware of thyself — there is a high price upon thy head, and Julian Avenel loves the glance of gold bonnet-pieces.“*

„Yet thou sayest not, that for lucre he would sell the blood of his guest?“

„Not if thou comest an invited stranger, relying on his faith,“ said the youth; „evil as Julian may be, he dare not break the rites of hospitality; for, loose as we are in all other ties, these are respected amongst us even to idolatry, and his nearest relations would think it incumbent on them to spill his blood themselves, to efface the disgrace such treason would bring upon their name and lineage. But if thou goest self-invited, and without assurance of safety, I promise thee thy risk is great.“

„I am in God's hand,“ answered the preacher, for such was Henry Warden; „it is on His errand that I traverse these wilds amidst dangers of every kind; while I am useful for my Master's service they shall not prevail against me, and when, like the barren fig-tree, I can no longer produce fruit, what imports it when or by whom the axe is laid to the root?“

„Your courage and devotion,“ said Glendinning, „are worthy of a better cause.“

* A gold coin of James V., the most beautiful of the Scottish series; so called because the effigies of the sovereign is represented wearing a bonnet.

„That,“ said Warden, „cannot be — mine is the very best.“

They continued their journey in silence, Halbert Glendinning tracing with the utmost accuracy the mazes of the dangerous and intricate morasses and hills which divided the Halidome from the barony of Avenel. From time to time he was obliged to stop, in order to assist his companion to cross the black intervals of quaking bog, called in the Scottish dialect hags, by which the firmer parts of the morass were intersected.

„Courage, old man,“ said Halbert, as he saw his companion almost exhausted with fatigue, „we shall soon be upon hard ground. And yet soft as this moss is, I have seen the merry falcons go through it as light as deer when the quarry was upon the flight.“

„True, my son,“ answered Warden, „for so I will still call you though you term me no longer father; and even so doth headlong youth pursue its pleasures, without regard to the mire and the peril of the paths through which they are hurried.“

„I have already told thee,“ answered Halbert Glendinning, sternly, „that I will hear nothing from thee that savours of doctrine.“

„Nay, but, my son,“ answered Warden, „thy spiritual father himself would surely not dispute the truth of what I have now spoken for your edification?“

Glendinning stoutly replied, „I know not how that may be — but I wot well it is the fashion of your brotherhood to bait your hook with fair discourse, and to hold yourselves up as angels of light, that you may the better extend the kingdom of darkness."

„May God," replied the preacher, „pardon those who have thus reported of his servants! I will not offend thee, my son, by being instant out of season — thou speakest but as thou art taught — yet sure I trust that so goodly a youth will be still rescued, like a brand from the burning."

While he thus spoke, the verge of the morass was attained, and their path lay on the declivity. Green-sward it was, and, viewed from a distance, chequered with its narrow and verdant line the dark-brown heath which it traversed, though the distinction was not so easily traced when they were walking on it. The old man pursued his journey with comparative ease, and unwilling again to awaken the jealous zeal of his young companion for the Roman faith, he discoursed on other matters. The tone of his conversation was still grave, moral, and instructive. He had travelled much, and knew both the language and manners of other countries, concerning which Halbert Glendinning, already anticipating the possibility of being obliged to quit Scotland for the deed he had done, was naturally and anxiously desirous of information. By degrees he was more attracted by the charms of the stranger's conversation than he was repelled by the dread of his dangerous character as a heretic, and Halbert had called him father more than once, ere the turrets of Avenel Castle came in view.

The situation of this ancient fortress was remarkable. It occupied a small rocky islet in a mountain lake, or tarn, as such a piece of water is called in Westmoreland. The lake might be about a mile in circumference, surrounded by hills of considerable height, which, except where old trees and brushwood occupied the ravines that divided them from each other, were bare and heathy. The surprise of the spectator was chiefly excited by finding a piece of water situated in that high and mountainous region, and the landscape around had features which might rather be termed wild, than either romantic or sublime; yet the scene was not without its charms. Under the burning sun of summer, the clear azure of the deep unruffled lake refreshed the eye, and impressed the mind with a pleasing feeling of deep solitude. In winter, when the snow lay on the mountains around, these dazzling masses appeared to ascend far beyond their wonted and natural height, while the lake, which stretched beneath, and filled their bosom with all its frozen waves, lay like the surface of a darkened and broken mirror around the black and rocky islet, and the walls of the grey castle with which it was crowned.

As the castle occupied, either with its principal buildings, or with its flanking and outward walls, every projecting point of rock, which served as its side, it seemed as completely surrounded by water as the nest of a wild swan, save where a narrow causeway extended betwixt the islet and the shore. But it was larger in appearance than in reality; and of the buildings which it actually contained, many had become ruinous and uninhabitable. In the times of the grandeur of the Avenel family, these had been occupied by a considerable garrison of followers and retainers, but they were now in a great measure deserted; and Julian Avenel would probably have fixed his habitation in a residence better suited to his diminished fortunes, had it not been for the great security which the situation of the old castle afforded to a man of his precarious and perilous mode of life. Indeed, in this respect, the spot could scarce have been more happily chosen, for it could be rendered almost completely inaccessible at the pleasure of the inhabitant. The distance betwixt the nearest shore and the islet was not indeed above an hundred yards; but then the causeway which connected them was extremely narrow, and completely divided by two cuts, one in the mid-way between the islet and shore, and another close under the outward gate of the castle. These formed a formidable, and almost insurmountable interruption to any hostile approach. Each was defended by a draw-bridge, one of which, being that nearest to the castle, was regularly raised at all times during the day, and both were lifted at night.

The situation of Julian Avenel, engaged in a variety of feuds, and a party to almost every dark and mysterious transaction which was on foot in that wild and military frontier, required all these precautions for his security. His own ambiguous and doubtful course of policy had increased these dangers; for as he made professions to both parties in the state, and occasionally united more actively with either the one or other, as chanced best to serve his immediate purpose, he could not be said to have either firm allies and protectors, or determined enemies.

His life was a life of expedients and of peril; and while, in pursuit of his interest he made all the doubles which he thought necessary to attain his object, he often over-ran his prey, and missed that which he might have gained by observing a straighter course.

CHAPTER XI.

I'll walk on tiptoe; arm my eye with caution,
My heart with courage, and my hand with weapon,
Like him who ventures on a lion's den.

Old Play.

WHEN, issuing from the gorge of a pass which terminated upon the lake, the travellers came in sight of the ancient castle of Avenel, the old man paused, and resting upon his pilgrim's staff, looked with earnest attention upon the scene before him. The castle was, as we have said, in many places ruinous, as was evident, even at this distance, by the broken, rugged, and irregular outline of the walls and of the towers. In others it seemed more entire, and a pillar of dark smoke, which ascended from the chimnies of the donjon, and spread its long dusky penon through the clear ether, indicated that it was inhabited. But no corn-fields or enclosed pasture-grounds on the side of the lake shewed that provident attention to comfort and subsistence which usually appeared near the houses of the greater, and even of the lesser barons. There were no cottages with their patches of infield, and their crofts and gardens, surrounded by rows of massive sycamores; no church with its simple tower in the valley; no herds of sheep among the hills; no cattle on the lower ground; nothing which intimated the occasional prosecution of the arts of peace and of industry. It was plain that the inhabitants, whether few or numerous, must be considered as the garrison of the castle, living within its defended precincts, and subsisting themselves by means which were other than peaceful.

Probably it was with this conviction that the old man, gazing on the castle, muttered to himself, „Lapis offensionis et petra scandali,“ and then, turning to Halbert Glendinning, he added, „We may say of yonder fort as King James did of another fastness in this province, that he who built it was a thief in his heart.“

„But it was not so,“ answered Glendinning; „yonder castle was built by the old lords of Avenel, men as much beloved in peace as they were respected in war. They were the bulwark of the frontiers against foreigners, and the protectors of the natives from domestic oppression. The present usurper of their inheritance no more resembles them, than the night-prowling owl resembles a falcon, because she builds on the same rock.“

„This Julian Avenel, then, holds no high place in the love and regard of his neighbours?“ said Warden.

„So little,“ answered Halbert, „that besides the jack-men and riders with whom he has associated himself, and of whom he has many at his disposal, I know of few who voluntarily associate with him. He has been more than once outlawed both by England and Scotland, his lands declared forfeited, and his head set at a price. But in these unquiet times, a man so daring as Julian Avenel has ever found some friends willing to protect him against the penalties of the law, on condition of his secret services."

"You describe a dangerous man," replied Warden.

"You may have experience of that," replied the youth, "if you deal not the more warily; — though it may be that he also has forsaken the communion of the church, and gone astray in the path of heresy."

"What your blindness terms the path of heresy," answered the reformer, "is indeed the straight and narrow way, wherein he who walks turns not aside, whether for worldly wealth or for worldly passions. — Would to God this man were moved by no other and no worse spirit than that which prompts my poor endeavours to extend the kingdom of Heaven! This Baron of Avenel is personally unknown to me, is not of our congregation or of our counsel; yet I bear to him charges touching my safety, from those whom he must fear if he does not respect them, and upon that assurance I will venture upon his hold — I am now sufficiently refreshed by these few minutes of repose."

"Take then this advice for your safety," said Halbert, "and believe that it is founded upon the usage of this country and its inhabitants. If you can better shift for yourself, go not to the castle of Avenel — if you do risk going thither, obtain from him, if possible, his safe conduct, and beware that he swears it by the Black Rood — And lastly, observe whether he eats with you at the board, or pledges you in the cup; for if he gives you not these signs of welcome, his thoughts are evil towards you.“

„Alas!“ said the preacher, „I have no better earthly refuge for the present than these frowning towers, but I go thither trusting to aid which is not of this earth — But thou, good youth, needest thou trust thyself in this dangerous den?“

„I,“ answered Halbert, „am in no danger. I am well known to Christie of the Clinthill, the henchman of this Julian Avenel; and, what is a yet better protection, I have nothing either to provoke malice or to tempt plunder.“

The tramp of a steed, which clattered along the shingly banks of the loch, was now heard behind them; and, when they looked back, a rider was visible, his steel cap, and the point of his long lance glancing in the setting sun, as he rode rapidly towards them.

Halbert Glendinning soon recognized Christie of the Clinthill, and made his companion aware that the henchman of Julian Avenel was approaching.

„Ha, youngling!“ said Christie to Halbert, as he came up to them, „thou hast made good my word at last, and come to take service with my noble master, hast thou not? Thou shalt find me a good friend and a true; and ere Saint

Barnaby come round again, thou shalt know every pass betwixt Millburn Plain and Netherby, as if thou hadst been born with a jack on thy back, and a lance in thy hand. — What old carle hast thou with thee? — He is not of the brotherhood of Saint Mary's — at least he has not the buist* of these black cattle.“

„He is a way-faring man,“ said Halbert, „who has concerns with Julian of Avenel. For myself, I intend to go to Edinburgh to see the court and the Queen, and when I return hither we will talk of your proffer. Meantime, as thou hast often invited me to the castle, I crave hospitality there to-night for myself and my companion.“

„For thyself and welcome, young comrade; but we harbour no pilgrims, nor aught that looks like a pilgrim.“

„So please you,“ said Warden, „I have letters of commendation to thy master from a sure friend, whom he will right willingly oblige in higher matters than in affording me a brief protection — And I am no pilgrim, but renounce the same, with all its superstitious observances.“

He offered his letters to the horseman, who shook his head.

„These,“ he said, „are matters for my master, and it will be well if he can read them himself; for me, sword and lance are my book and psalter, and have been since I was twelve years old. But I will guide you to the castle, and the Baron of Avenel will himself judge of your errand."

* Buist — The brand or mark set upon sheep or cattle by their owners.

By this time the party had reached the causeway, along which Christie advanced at a trot, intimating his presence to the warders within the castle by a shrill and peculiar whistle. At this signal the farther draw-bridge was lowered. The horseman passed it, and disappeared under the gloomy portal which was beyond it.

Glendinning and his companion advancing more leisurely along the rugged causeway, stood at length under the same gateway, over which frowned, in dark red freestone, the ancient armorial bearings of the house of Avenel, which represented a female figure shrouded and muffled, which occupied the whole field. The cause of their assuming so singular a device was uncertain, but the figure was generally supposed to represent the mysterious being called the White Lady of Avenel.* The sight of this mouldering shield awakened in the mind of Halbert the strange circumstances which had connected his fate with that of Mary Avenel, and with the doings of the spiritual being who was attached to her house, and whom he saw here represented in stone, as he had before seen her effigy upon the seal ring of Walter Avenel which, with other trinkets formerly mentioned, had been saved from pillage, and brought to Glendearg,

* There is an ancient English family which bears, or did bear, a phantom assant sable in a field argent.

when Mary's mother was driven from her habitation.

„You sigh, my son,“ said the old man, observing the impression made on his youthful companion's countenance, but mistaking the cause; „if you fear to enter, we may yet return.“

„That can ye not,“ said Christie of the Clinthill, who emerged at that instant from the side door under the arch-way. „Look yonder, and chuse whether you will return skimming the water like a wild duck, or winging the air like a plover.“

They looked, and saw that the drawbridge which they had just crossed was again raised, and now interposed its planks betwixt the setting sun and the portal of the castle, deepening the gloom of the arch under which they stood. Christie laughed and bid them follow him, saying, by way of encouragement, in Halbert's ear, „Answer boldly and readily to whatever the Baron asks you. Never stop to pick your words, and above all shew no fear of him — the devil is not so black as he is painted.“

As he spoke thus, he introduced them into the large stone hall, at the upper end of which blazed a huge fire of wood. The long oaken table, which as usual occupied the midst of the apartment, was covered with rude preparations for the evening meal of the Baron and his chief domestics, five or six of whom, strong athletic savage-looking men, paced up and down the lower end of the hall, which rang to the jarring clang of their long swords that clashed as they moved, and to the heavy tramp of their high-heeled jack-boots. Iron jacks, or coats of buff, formed the principal part of their dress, and steel-bonnets, or large slouched hats with Spanish plumes drooping backwards, were their head attire.

The Baron of Avenel was one of those tall muscular martial figures which are the favourite subjects of Salvator Rosa. He wore a cloak which had been once gaily trimmed, but which, by long wear and frequent exposure to the weather, was now faded in its colours. Thrown negligently about his tall person, it partly hid and partly shewed a short doublet of buff, under which was in some places visible that light shirt of mail which was called a secret, because worn instead of more ostensible armour to protect against private assassination. A leathern belt sustained a large and heavy sword on the one side, and on the other that gay poniard which had once called Sir Piercie Shafton master, of which the hatchments and gildings were already much defaced, either by rough usage or neglect.

Notwithstanding the rudeness of his apparel, Julian Avenel's manner and countenance had far more elevation than those of the attendants who surrounded him. He might be fifty or upwards, for his dark hair was mingled with grey, but age had neither tamed the fire of his eye or the enterprize of his disposition. His countenance had been handsome, for beauty was an attribute of the family; but the lines were roughened by fatigue and exposure to the weather, and rendered coarse by the habitual indulgence of violent passions.

He seemed in deep and moody reflection, and was pacing at a distance from his dependants along the upper end of the hall, sometimes stopping from time to time to caress and feed a goss-hawk, which sate upon his wrist, with its jesses (i. e. the leathern straps fixed to its legs,) wrapt around his finger. The bird, which seemed not insensible to its master's intention, answered his caresses by ruffling forward its feathers, and pecking playfully at his hand. At such intervals the Baron smiled, but instantly resumed the darksome air of sullen meditation. He did not even deign to look upon an object, which few could have passed and repassed so often without bestowing on it a transient glance.

This was a woman of exceeding beauty, rather gaily than richly attired, who sate on a low seat close by the huge hall chimney. The gold chains round her neck and arms, — the gay gown of green which swept the floor, — the silver-embroidered girdle, with its bunch of keys depending in housewifely pride by a silver chain, — the yellow silken couvrechef (Scotticé curch) which was disposed around her head, and partly concealed her dark profusion of hair, — above all, the circumstance so delicately touched in the old ballad, that „the girdle was too short,“ the „gown of green all too wide,“ for the wearer's present shape, would have intimated the Baron's Lady. But then the lowly seat, — the expression of deep melancholy, which was changed into a timid smile whenever she saw the least chance of catching the eye of Julian Avenel, — the subdued look of grief, and the starting tear for which that constrained smile was again exchanged when she saw herself entirely disregarded, — these were not attributes of a wife, or they were those of a dejected and afflicted one.

Julian Avenel, as we have said, continued to pace the hall without paying any of that mute attention which is rendered to almost every female either by affection or courtesy. He seemed totally unconscious of her presence, or of that of his attendants, and was only roused from his own dark reflections by the attention he paid to the falcon, to which, however, the lady seemed to attend, as if studying either to find an opportunity of speaking to the Baron, or of finding something enigmatical in the expressions which he used to the bird. All this the strangers had time enough to remark; for no sooner had they entered the apartment, than their usher, Christie of the Clinthill, after exchanging a significant glance with the menials or troopers at the lower end of the apartment, signed to Halbert Glendinning and to his companion to stand still near the door, while he himself, advancing nearer the table, placed himself in such a situation as to catch the Baron's observation when he should be disposed to look around, but without presuming to intrude himself on his master's attention. Indeed the look of this man, naturally bold, hardy, and audacious, seemed totally changed when he was in presence of his master, and resembled the dejected and cowering manner of a quarrelsome dog when rebuked by his owner, or when he finds himself obliged to deprecate the violence of a superior adversary of his own species.

In spite of the novelty of his own situation, and every painful feeling connected with it, Halbert felt his curiosity interested in the female, who sat by the chimney unnoticed and unregarded. He marked with what keen and trembling solicitude she watched the broken words of Julian, and how her glance stole towards him, ready to be averted upon the slightest chance of his perceiving himself to be watched.

Meantime he went on with his dalliance with his feathered favourite, now giving, now withholding the morsel with which he was about to feed the bird, and so exciting its appetite and gratifying it by turns. „What, more yet? — thou foul kite, thou wouldst never have done — give thee part thou wilt have all — Ay, prune thy feathers, and prink thyself gay — much thou wilt make of it now — doest think I know thee not? — doest think I see not that all that ruffling and pluming of wing and feathers is not for thy master, but to try what thou canst make of him, thou greedy gled? — well — there — take it then, and rejoice thyself — little boon goes far with thee, and with all thy sex — and so it should “

He ceased to look on the bird, and again traversed the apartment. Then taking another small piece of meat from the trencher, on which it was placed ready cut for his use, he began once again to tempt and tease the bird, by offering and withdrawing it, until he awakened its wild and bold disposition. „What! struggling, fluttering, aiming at me with beak and single? *

* In the kindly language of hawking, as Lady Juliana Berners terms it, hawks' talons are called their singles.

So la! So la! wouldst mount? wouldst fly? the jesses are round thy clutches, fool—thou canst neither stir nor soar, but by my will—Beware thou come to reclaim, wench, else I will wring thy head off one of these days — Well, have it then, and well fare thou with it. — So ho, Jenkin!“ One of the attendants stepped forward — „Take the fowl gled hence to the mew — I am weary of her—Look well to her casting and to her bathing — we will see her fly to-morrow. — How now, Christie, so soon returned!“

Christie advanced to his master, and gave an account of himself and his journey, in the way in which a police-officer holds communication with his magistrate, that is, as much by signs as by words.

„Noble sir,“ said that worthy satellite, „the Laird of —,“ he named no place, but pointed with his finger in a south-western direction, — „may not ride with you the day he purposed, because the Lord Warden has threatened that he will —“

Here another blank, intelligibly enough made up by the speaker touching his own neck with his left fore-finger, and leaning a little to one side.

„Cowardly caitiff!“ said Julian; „by Heaven! the whole world turns sheer naught — it is not worth a brave man living in — ye may ride a day and night, and never see a feather wave or hear a horse prance — the spirit of our fathers is dead amongst us — the very brutes are degenerated — the cattle we bring home at our life's risk are mere carrion — our hawks are riflers* — our hounds are turn-spits and trindle-tails — our men are women — and our women are — — —“

He looked at the female for the first time, and stopped short in the midst of what he was about to say, though there was something so contemptuous in the glance, that the blank might have been thus filled up — „Our women are such as she is.“

He said it not however, and, as if desirous of attracting his attention at all risks, and in whatever manner, she rose and came forward to him, but with a timorousness ill-disguised by affected gaiety. — „Our women, Julian — what would you say of the women?“

„Nothing,“ answered Julian Avenel, „at least nothing but that they are kindhearted wenches like thyself, Kate.“ The female coloured deeply, and returned to her seat. — „And what strangers hast thou brought with thee, Christie, that stand yonder like two stone statues?“ said the Baron.

„The taller,“ said Christie, „is, so please you, a young fellow called Halbert Glendinning, the eldest son of the old widow at Glendearg.“

„What brings him here?“ said the Baron; „hath he any message from Mary Avenel?“

„Not as I think,“ said Christie; „the youth is roving the country — he was always a wild

* So termed when they only caught their prey by the feathers, slip, for I have known him since he was the height of my sword.“

„What qualities hath he?“ said the Baron.

„All manner of qualities,“ answered his follower — „he can strike a buck, track a deer, fly a hawk, halloo to a hound — he shoots in the long and cross-bow to a hair'sbreadth — wields a lance or sword like myself nearly — backs a horse manfully and fairly — I wot not what more a man need to do to make him a gallant companion.“

„And who,“ said the Baron, „is the old miser who stands beside him?“

„Some cast of a priest as I fancy — he says he is charged with letters to you.“

„Bid them come forward,“ said the Baron; and no sooner had they approached him more nearly, than, struck by the fine form and strength displayed by Halbert Glendinning, he addressed him thus: — „I am told, young swankie, that you are roaming the world to seek your fortune — if you will serve Julian Avenel, you may find it without going farther.“

„So please you,“ answered Glendinning, „something has chanced to me that makes it better I should leave this land, and I am bound for Edinburgh.“

„What! — thou hast stricken some of the king's deer, I warrant, — or lightened the meadows of Saint Mary's of some of their beeves — or thou hast taken a moonlight leap over the Border?“

„No, sir,“ said Halbert, „my case is entirely different.“

„Then I warrant thee thou hast stabbed some brother churl in a fray about a wench — thou art a likely lad to wrangle in such a cause.“

Ineffably disgusted at his tone and manner, Halbert Glendinning remained silent while the thought darted across his mind, what would Julian Avenel have said, had he known the quarrel, of which he spoke so lightly, had arisen on account of his own brother's daughter. — „But be the cause of flight what it will,“ said Julian in continuation, „doest thou think the law or its emissaries can follow thee into this island, or arrest thee under the standard of Avenel? — Look at the depth of the lake, the strength of the walls, the length of the causeway — look at my men, and think if they are like to see a comrade injured, or if I, their master, am a man to desert a faithful follower, in good or evil. I tell thee, it shall be an eternal day of truce betwixt thee and justice as they call it, from the instant thou hast put my colours into thy cap — thou shalt ride by the Warden's nose as thou would'st pass an old market-woman, and ne'er a cur which follows him shall dare to bay at thee!“

„I thank you for your offers, noble sir, replied Halbert, „but I must answer in brief, that I cannot profit by them — my fortunes lead me elsewhere.“

„Thou art a self-willed fool for thy pains,“ said Julian, turning from him; and signing to Christie to approach, he whispered in his ear, „There is promise in that young fellow's looks, Christie, and we want men of limbs and sinews so compacted — those thou hast brought to me of late are the mere refuse of mankind, wretches scarce worth the arrow that ends them: this youngster is limbed like Saint George. Ply him with wine and wassail let the wenches weave their meshes about him like spiders — thou understandest?“ Christie gave a sagacious nod of intelligence, and fell back to a respectful distance from his master. — „And thou, old man,“ said the Baron, turning to the elder traveller, „hast thou been roaming the world after fortune too? — it seems not she has fallen into thy way.“

„So please you,“ replied Warden, „I were perhaps more to be pitied than I am now, had I indeed met with that fortune, which, like others, I have sought in my greener days.“

„Nay, understand me, friend,“ said the Baron; „if thou art satisfied with thy buckram gown and long staff, I also am well content thou shouldst be as poor and contemptible as is good for the health of thy body and soul — All I care to know of thee is, the cause which hath brought thee to my castle, where few crows of thy kind care to settle. Thou art, I warrant thee, some ejected monk of a suppressed convent, paying in his old days the price of the luxurious idleness in which he spent his youth. — Ay, or it may be some pilgrim with a budget of lies from Saint James of Compostella, or Our Lady of Loretto; or thou mayest be some pardoner with his budget of reliques from Rome, forgiving sins at a penny a dozen, and one to the tale — Ay, I guess why I find thee in this boy's company, and doubtless thou wouldst have such a strapping lad as he to carry thy wallet, and relieve thy lazy shoulders; but by the mass, I will cross thy cunning. I make my vow to sun and moon; I will not see a proper lad so misleard as to run the country with an old knave, like Simmie and his brother.* Away with thee!“ he added, rising in wrath, and speaking so fast as to give no opportunity of answer, being probably determined to terrify the elder guest into an abrupt flight — „Away with thee, with thy clouted coat, scrip, and scallopshell, or, by the name of Avenel, I will have them loose the hounds on thee.“

Warden waited with the greatest patience until Julian Avenel, astonished that the threats and violence of his language made no impression on him, paused in a sort of wonder, and said in a less imperious tone, „Why the fiend doest thou not answer me?“

„When you have done speaking,“ said Warden, in the same composed manner, „it will be full time to reply.“

„Say on; man, in the devil's name — but take heed — beg not here — were it but for the rinds of cheese, the refuse of the rats, or a morsel that my dogs would turn from — neither a grain of meal, nor the nineteenth part of a gray groat, will I give to any feigned limmar of thy coat.“

„It may be,“ answered Warden, „that you would have less quarrel with my coat if you

* Two quaestionarii, or begging friars, whose accoutrements and roguery make the subject of an old Scottish satirical poem.

knew what it covers. I am neither friar nor mendicant, and would be right glad to hear thy testimony against these foul deceivers of God's church, and usurpers of his rights over the Christian flock, were it given in Christian charity."

„And who or what art thou, man," said Avenel, „that thou comest to this Border land, and art neither monk, nor soldier, nor broken man?"

„I am an humble teacher of the holy word," answered Warden. „This letter from a most noble person will speak why I am here at this present time."

He delivered the letter to the Baron, who regarded the seal with some surprise, and then looked on the letter itself, which seemed to excite still more. He then looked fixedly at the stranger, and said, in a menacing tone, „I think thou darest not betray me, or deceive me?"

„I am not the man to attempt either," was the concise reply.

Julian Avenel carried the letter to the window, where he perused, or at least attempted to peruse it more than once, often looking from the paper and gazing on the stranger who had delivered it, as if he meant to read the purport of the missive in the face of the messenger. Julian at length called to the female, — „Catherine, bestir thee, and fetch me presently that letter which I bade thee keep ready at hand in thy casket, having no sure lockfast place of my own."

Catherine went with the readiness of one willing to be employed; and as she walked, the situation which requires a wider gown and a longer girdle, and in which woman claims from man a double proportion of the most anxious care, was still more visible than before. She soon returned with the paper, and was rewarded with a cold — „I thank thee, wench — thou art a careful secretary.“

This second paper he also perused and re-perused more than once, and still, as he read it, bent from time to time a wary and observant eye upon Henry Warden. This examination and re-examination, though both the man and the place were dangerous, the preacher endured with the most composed and steady countenance, seeming, under the eagle, or rather the vulture eye of the Baron, as unmoved as under the gaze of an ordinary and peaceful peasant. At length Julian Avenel folded both papers, and having put them into the pocket of his cloak, cleared his brow, and coming forward, addressed his female companion. „Catherine,“ said he, „I have done this good man injustice, when I mistook him for one of the drones of Rome. He is a preacher, Catherine — a preacher of the — the new doctrine of the Lords of the Congregation.“

„The doctrine of the blessed Scriptures,“ said the preacher, „purified from the devices of men.“

„Sayest thou?“ said Julian Avenel — „Well, thou mayest call it what thou lists; but to me it is recommended, because it flings off all those sottish dreams about saints and angels and devils, and unhorses the lazy monks that have ridden us so long, and spur-galled us so hard. No more masses and corpse-gifts, no more tithes and offerings to make men poor — no more prayers or psalms to make men cowards — no more christenings and penances, and confessions and marriages.“

„So please you,“ said Henry Warden, „it is against the corruptions, not against the fundamental doctrines of the church, which we desire to renovate, and not to abolish.“

„Pr'ythee, peace, man,“ said the Baron; „we of the laity care not what you set up, so you pull merrily down what stands in our way. Specially it suits well with us of the Southland fells; for it is our profession to turn the world upside down, and we live ever the blithest life when the downer side is uppermost.“

Warden would have replied; but the Baron allowed him not time, striking the table with the hilt of his dagger, and crying out, — „Ha! you loitering knaves, bring our supper-meal quickly. See you not this holy man is exhausted for lack of food? Heard ye ever of priest or preacher that devoured not his five meals a day?“

The attendants bustled to and fro, and speedily brought in several large smoaking platters, filled with huge pieces of beef, boiled and roasted, but without any variety whatsoever; without vegetables, and almost without bread, though there was at the upper end a few oat-cakes in a basket. Julian Avenel made a sort of apology to Warden.

„You have been commended to our care, Sir Preacher, since that is your style, by a person whom we highly honour.“

„I am assured,“ said Warden, „that the most noble Lord“ —

„Pr'ythee, peace, man,“ said Avenel; „what need of naming names, so we understand each other? I meant but to speak in reference to your safety and comfort, of which he desires us to be chary. Now, for your safety, look at my walls and water. But touching your comfort, we have no corn of our own, and the meal-girnels of the south are less easily transported than their beeves, seeing they have no legs to walk upon. But what though? a stoup of wine thou shalt have, and of the best — thou shalt sit betwixt Catherine and me at the boardend. — And, Christie, do thou look to the young springald, and call to the cellarer for a flagon of the best.“

The Baron took his wonted seat at the upper end of the board; his Catherine sate down, and courteously pointed to a seat betwixt them for their reverend guest. But notwithstanding the influence both of hunger and fatigue, Henry Warden retained his standing posture.

CHAPTER XII.

When lovely woman stoops to folly,
And finds too late that men betray—

* * * *

JULIAN AVENEL saw with surprise the demeanour of the reverend stranger. „Beshrew me,” he said, „these new-fashioned religioners have fast-days, I warrant me—the old ones used to confer these blessings chiefly on the laity.“

„We acknowledge no such rule,” said the preacher — „We hold that our faith consists not in using or abstaining from special meats on special days; and in fasting we rend our hearts, and not our garments.“

„The better—the better for yourselves, and the worse for Tom Tailor,” said the Baron; „but come, sit down, or if thou needs must e'en give us a cast of thy office, mutter thy charm.“

„Sir Baron,” said the preacher, „I am in a strange land, where neither mine office nor my doctrine are known, and where, it would seem, both are greatly misunderstood. It is my duty so to bear me, that in my person, however unworthy, my master's dignity may be respected, and that sin may take no confidence from relaxation of the bonds of discipline.“

„Ho la! halt there,” said the Baron; „thou wert sent hither for thy safety, but not, I think, to preach to, or controul me. What is it thou wouldst wouldst have, Sir Preacher? Remember thou speakest to one somewhat short of patience, who loves a short health and a long draught.“

„In a word, then,“ said Henry Warden, „that lady“—

„How?“ said the Baron starting— „what of her? — what hast thou to say of that dame?

„Is she thy house-dame?“ said the preacher, after a moment's pause, in which he seemed to seek for the best mode of expressing what he had to say— „Is she in brief thy wife?“

The unfortunate young woman pressed both her hands on her face, as if to hide it, but the deep blush which crimsoned her brow and neck, shewed that her cheeks were also glowing; and the bursting tears which found their way betwixt her slender fingers, bore witness to her sorrow, as well as to her shame.

„Now, by my father's ashes!“ said the Baron, rising and spurning from him his footstool with such violence, that it hit the wall on the opposite side of the apartment — then instantly constraining himself, he muttered, „What need to run myself into trouble for a fool's word?“— then resuming his seat, he answered coldly and scornfully — „No, Sir Priest or Sir Preacher, Catherine is not my wife—Cease thy whimpering, thou foolish wench—she is not my wife, but she is handfasted with me, and that makes her as honest a woman.“

„Handfasted?“—repeated Warden.

„Knowest thou not that rite, holy man?“ said Avenel, in the same tone of derision; „then I will tell thee—we Border-men are more wary than your inland clowns of Fife and Lothian—no jump in the dark for us — no cleaving the fetters around our wrists till we know how they will wear with us — we take our wives, like our horses, upon trial. When we are handfasted, as we term it, we are man and wife for a year and day — that space gone by, each may chuse another mate, or, at their pleasure, may call the priest to marry them for life — and this we call handfasting.“

„Then,“ said the preacher, „I tell thee, noble Baron, in brotherly love to thy soul, it is a custom licentious, gross, and corrupted, and, if persisted in, dangerous, yea, damnable. It binds thee to the frailer being while she is the object of desire — it relieves thee when she is most the subject of pity — it gives all to brutal sense, and nothing to generous and gentle affection. I say to thee, that he who can meditate the breach of such an engagement, abandoning the deluded woman and the helpless offspring, is worse than the birds of prey; for of them the males remain with their mates until the nestlings can take wing. Above all, I say it is contrary to the pure Christian doctrine, which assigns woman to man as the partner of his labour, the soother of his evil, his helpmate in peril, his friend in affliction; not as the toy of his looser hours, or as a flower, which, once cropped, he may throw aside at pleasure.“

„Now, by the Saints, a most virtuous homily!“ said the Baron; „quaintly conceived and curiously pronounced, and to a well chosen congregation. Hark ye, Sir Gospeller! trow ye to have a fool in hand? Know I not that your sect rose by bluff Harry Tudor, merily because ye aided him to change his Kate; and wherefore should I not use the same Christian liberty with mine? Tush, man! bless the good food, and meddle not with what concerns thee not—thou hast no gull in Julian Avenel.”

„He hath gulled and cheated himself,“ said the preacher, „should he even incline to do that poor sharer of his domestic cares the imperfect justice that remains to him. Can he now raise her to the rank of a pure and uncontaminated matron?—Can he deprive his child of the misery of owing birth to a mother who has erred? He can indeed give them both the rank, the state of married wife and of a lawful son; but, in public opinion, their names will be smirched and sullied with a stain which his tardy efforts cannot entirely efface. Yet render it to them, Baron of Avenel, render to them this late and imperfect justice. Bid me bind you together for ever, and celebrate the day of your bridal, not with feasting or wassell, but with sorrow for past sin, and the resolution to commence a better life. Happy then will have the chance been that has drawn me to this castle, though I come driven by calamity, and unknowing where my course is bound, like a leaf travelling on the north wind.“

The plain, and even coarse features of the zealous speaker, were warmed at once and ennobled by the dignity of his enthusiasm and the wild Baron, lawless as he was, and accustomed to spurn at the controul whether of religious or moral law, felt, for the first time perhaps in his life, that he was under subjection to a mind superior to his own. He sate mute and suspended in his deliberations, hesitating betwixt anger and shame, yet borne down by the weight of the just rebuke thus boldly fulminated against him.

The unfortunate young woman, conceiving hopes from her tyrant's silence and apparent indecision, forgot both her fear and shame in her timid expectation that Avenel would relent; and fixing upon him her anxious and beseeching eyes, gradually drew near and nearer to his seat, till at length, laying a trembling hand on his cloak, she ventured to utter, „O noble Julian, listen to the good man!“

The speech and the motion were ill-timed, and wrought on that proud and wayward spirit the reverse of her wishes.

„Julian Avenel started up in fury, exclaiming, „What! thou foolish callet, art thou confederate with this strolling vagabond, whom thou hast seen beard me in my own hall! Hence with thee, and think that I am proof both to male and female hypocrisy!“

The poor girl started back, astounded at his voice of thunder and looks of fury, and, turning pale as death, endeavoured to obey his orders, and tottered towards the door. Her limbs failed her in the attempt, and she fell on the stone floor in a manner which her situation might have rendered fatal—The blood gushed from her face. — Halbert Glendinning brooked not a sight so brutal, but, uttering a deep imprecation, started from his seat, and laid his hand on his sword, under the strong impulse of passing it through the body of the cruel and hard-hearted ruffian. But Christie of the Clinthill, guessing his intention, threw his arms around him, and prevented him from stirring to execute his purpose.

The impulse to such a dangerous act of violence was indeed but momentary, as it instantly appeared that Avenel himself, shocked at the effects of his violence, was lifting up and endeavouring to sooth in his own way the terrified Catherine.

„Peace,“ he said, „prithee peace, thou silly minion—why, Kate, though I listen not to this tramping preacher, I said not what might happen, an thou dost bear me a stout boy. There—there—dry thy tears—call thy women.—So ho!—where be these queans?—Christie—Rowley—Hutcheon—drag them hither by the hair of the head.“

A half dozen of startled wild-looking females rushed into the room, and bore out her who might be either termed their mistress or their companion. She shewed little sign of life, except by groaning faintly and keeping her hand on her side.

No sooner had this luckless female been conveyed from the apartment, than the Baron, advancing to the table, filled and drank a deep goblet of wine; then, putting an obvious restraint on his passions, turned to the preacher, who stood horror-struck at the scene he had witnessed, and said, „You have borne too hard on us, Sir Preacher—but coming with the commendations which you have brought me, I doubt not but your meaning was good. But we are a wilder folk than you inland men of Fife and Lothian. Be advised, therefore, by me—Spur not an unbroken horse—put not your ploughshare too deep into new land—Preach to us spiritual liberty, and we will hearken to you.—But we will give no way to spiritual bondage. — Sit, therefore, down, and pledge me in old sack, and we will talk over other matters.“

„It is from spiritual bondage,“ said the preacher, in the same tone of admonitory reproof, „that I came to deliver you — it is from a bondage more fearful than that of the heaviest earthly gyves — it is from your own evil passions.“

„Sit down,“ said Avenel, fiercely; „sit down while the play is good — else by my father's crest and by my mother's honour!“ —

„Now,“ whispered Christie of the Clinthill to Halbert, „if he refuse to sit down, I would not give a grey groat for his head.“

„Lord Baron,“ said Warden, „thou hast placed me in extremity. But if the question be, whether I am to hide the light which I am commanded to shew forth, or to lose the light of this world, my choice is made. I say to thee, like the Holy Baptist to Herod, it is not lawful for thee to have this woman; and I say it, though bonds and death be the consequence, counting my life as nothing in comparison of the ministry to which I am called.“

Julian Avenel, enraged at the firmness of this reply, flung from his right hand the cup in which he was about to drink to his guest, and from the other cast off the hawk, which flew wildly through the apartment. His first motion was to lay hand upon his dagger. But changing his resolution, he exclaimed, „To the dungeon with this insolent stroller! — I will hear no man speak a word for him. — Look to the falcon, Christie, thou fool — an she escape, I will dispatch you after her every man — Away with that hypocritical dreamer! drag him hence if he resist.“

He was obeyed in both points. — Christie of the Clinthill arrested the hawk's flight, by putting his foot on her jesses, and so holding her fast, while Henry Warden was led off, without having shewn the slightest symptom of terror, by two of the Baron's satellites. Julian Avenel walked the apartment for a short space in sullen silence, and dispatching one of his attendants with a whispered message, which probably related to the health of the unfortunate Catherine, he said aloud, „These rash and meddling priests— by Heaven! they make us worse than we would be without them.“

The answer which he presently received seemed somewhat to pacify his angry mood, and he took his place at the board, commanding his retinue to do the like. All sate down in silence, and begun the repast.

During the meal, Christie in vain attempted to engage his youthful companion in carousal, or, at least, in conversation. Halbert Glendinning pleaded fatigue, and expressed himself unwilling to taste any liquor stronger than the heather-ale, which was at that time frequently used at meals. Thus every effort at joviality died away, until the Baron, striking his hand against the table, as if impatient of the long unbroken silence, cried out aloud: „What, ho! my masters — are ye Border-riders, and sit as mute over your meal as a mess of monks and friars?— Some one sing, if no one list to speak. Meat eaten without either mirth or music, is ill of digestion. — Louis,“ he added, speaking to one of the youngest of his followers, „thou art ready enough to sing when no one bids thee.“

The young man looked first at his master, then up to the arched roof of the hall, then drank off the horn of ale, or wine, which stood beside him, and with a rough, yet not unmelodious voice, sung the following ditty to the ancient air of „Blue Bonnets over the Border.“

1.

March, march, Ettrick and Teviotdale,
Why the deil dinna ye march forward in order;
March, march, Eskdale and Liddesdale,
All the blue bonnets are bound for the Border,
Many a banner spread,
Flutters above your head,
Many a crest that is famous in story,
Mount, and make ready then,
Sons of the mountain glen,
Fight for the Queen and our old Scottish glory.

2.

Come from the hills where your hirsels are grazing,
Come from the glen of the buck and the roe;
Come to the crag where the beacon is blazing,
Come with the buckler, the lance, and the bow,
Trumpets are sounding,
War-steeds are bounding,
Stand to your arms then, and march in good order, England shall many a day,
Tell of the bloody fray,
When the Blue Bonnets came over the Border.

The song, rude as it was, had in it that warlike character which at any other time would have roused Halbert's spirit; but at present the charm of minstrelsy had no effect upon him. He made it his request to Christie to suffer him to retire to rest, a request with which that worthy person, seeing no chance of making a favourable impression on his intended proselyte in his present humour, was at length pleased to comply. But no Serjeant Kite, who ever practised the profession of recruiting, was more attentive that his object should not escape him, than was Christie of the Clinthill. He indeed conducted Halbert Glendinning to a small apartment overlooking the lake, which was accommodated with a truckle bed. But before quitting him, Christie took special care to give a look to the bars which crossed the outside of the window, and when he left the apartment, he failed not to give the key a double turn; circumstances which convinced young Glendinning that there was no intention of suffering him to depart from the Castle of Avenel at his own time and pleasure. He judged it, however, most prudent to let these alarming symptoms pass without observation.

No sooner did he find himself in undisturbed solitude, than he ran rapidly over the events of the day in his recollection, and to his surprise found that his own precarious fate, and even the death of Piercie Shafton made less impression on him than the singularly bold and determined conduct of his companion, Henry Warden. Providence, which suits its implements to the end they are to achieve, had awakened in the cause of Reformation in Scotland, a body of preachers of more energy than refinement, bold in spirit and strong in faith, contemners of whatever stood betwixt them and their principal object, and seeking the advancement of the great cause in which they laboured by the roughest road, provided it were the shortest. The soft breeze may wave the willow, but it requires the voice of the tempest to agitate the boughs of the oak; and, accordingly, to milder hearers, and in less rude age, their manners would have been ill-adapted, but they were singularly successful in their mission to the rude people to whom it was addressed.

Owing to these reasons, Halbert Glendinning, who had resisted and repelled the arguments of the preacher, was forcibly struck by the firmness of his demeanour in the dispute with Julian Avenel. It might be discourteous and most certainly it was incautious, to choose such a place and such an audience, for upbraiding with his transgressions a baron, whom both manners and situation placed in full possession of independent power. But the conduct of the preacher was uncompromising, firm, manly, and obviously grounded upon the deepest conviction which duty and principle could afford; and Glendinning, who had viewed the conduct of Avenel with the deepest abhorrence, was proportionally interested in the brave old man, who had ventured life rather than withhold the censure due to guilt. This pitch of virtue seemed to him to be in religion what was demanded by chivalry of her votaries in war; an absolute surrender of all selfish feelings, and a combination of every energy proper to the human mind, to discharge the task which duty demanded.

Halbert was at the period when youth is most open to generous emotions, and knows best how to appreciate them in others, and he felt, although he hardly knew why, that, whether catholic or heretic, the safety of this man deeply interested him. Curiosity mingled with the feeling, and led him to wonder what the nature of those doctrines could be, which stole their votary so completely from himself, and devoted him to chains or to death as their sworn champion. He had indeed been told of saints and martyrs of former days, who had braved for their religious faith the extremity of death and torture. But their spirit of enthusiastic devotion had long slept in the ease and indolent habits of their successors, and their adventures, like those of knighterrant, were rather read for amusement than for edification. A new impulse had been necessary to re-kindle the energies of religious zeal, and that impulse was now operating in favour of a purer religion, with one of whose truest votaries the youth had now met for the first time.

The sense that he himself was a prisoner under the power of this savage chieftain, by no means diminished Halbert's interest in the fate of his fellow-sufferer, while he determined at the same time so far to emulate his fortitude, that neither threats nor suffering should compel him to enter into the service of such a master. The possibility of escape next occurred to him, and though with little hope in effecting it in that way, Glendinning proceeded to examine more particularly the window of the apartment. The apartment was situated in the first storey of the castle, and was not so far from the rock on which it was founded, but what an active and bold man might with little assistance descend to a shelf of the rock which was immediately below the window, and from thence either leap or drop himself down into the lake which lay below his eye, clear and blue in the placid light of a full summer's moon. — „Were I once placed on that ledge,“ thought Glendinning, „Julian Avenel and Christie had seen the last of me.“ The size of the window favoured such an attempt, but the stancheons or iron bars seemed to form an insurmountable obstacle.

While Halbert Glendinning gazed from the window with that eagerness of hope which was prompted by the energy of his character and his determination not to yield to circumstances, his ear caught some sounds from below, and listening with more attention, he could distinguish the voice of the preacher engaged in his solitary devotions. To open a correspondence with him became immediately his object, and failing to do so by less marked sounds, he at length ventured to speak, and was answered from beneath — „Is it thou, my son?“ The voice of the prisoner now sounded more plain than when it was first heard, for Warden had approached the small aperture, which, serving his prison for a window, opened just betwixt the wall and the rock, and admitted a scanty portion of light through a wall of immense thickness. This soupirail being placed exactly under Halbert's window, the contiguity permitted the prisoners to converse in a low tone, when Halbert declared his intention to escape, and the possibility he saw of achieving his purpose, but for the iron stanchions of the window — „Prove thy strength, my son, in the name of God!“ said the preacher. Halbert obeyed him more in despair than hope, but to his great astonishment, and somewhat to his terror, the bar parted asunder near the bottom, and the longer part being easily bent outwards and not secured with lead in the upper socket, dropt out into Halbert's hand. He immediately whispered, but as energetically as a whisper could be expressed— „By Heaven, the bar has given way in my hand!“

„Thank Heaven, my son, instead of swearing by it,“ answered Warden from his dungeon.

With little effort Halbert Glendinning forced himself through the opening thus wonderfully effected, and using his leathern sword-belt as a rope to assist him, let himself safely drop upon the shelf of rock upon which the preacher's window opened. But through this no passage could be effected, being scarce larger than a loop-hole for musketry, and apparently constructed for that purpose.

„Are there no means by which I can assist your escape, my father?“ said Halbert.

„There is none, my son,“ answered the preacher; „but if thou wilt ensure my safety, that may be in thy power.“

„I will labour earnestly for it,“ said the youth.

„Take then a letter which I will presently write, for I have the means of light and writing materials in my scrip—Hasten towards Edinburgh, and on the way thou wilt meet a body of horse marching southwards—Give this to their leader, and acquaint him of the state in which thou hast left me. It may hap that thy doing so will advantage thyself."

In a minute or two the light of a taper gleamed through the shot-hole, and very shortly after, the preacher, with the assistance of his staff, pushed a billet to Glendinning through the window.

„God bless thee, my son," said the old man, „and complete the marvellous work which he has begun."

„Amen!" answered Halbert, with solemnity, and proceeded on his enterprize.

He hesitated a moment whether he should attempt to descend to the edge of the water; but the steepness of the rock, and darkness of the night, rendered the enterprize too dangerous. He clasped his hands above his head and boldly sprung from the precipice, shooting himself forward into the air as far as he could for fear of sunken rocks, and alighted on the lake, head foremost, with such force as sunk him for a minute below the surface. But strong, long-breathed, and accustomed to such exercise, Halbert, even though encumbered with his sword, dived and rose like a sea-fowl, and swam across the lake in the northern direction. When he landed and looked back on the castle, he could observe that the alarm had been given, for lights glanced from window to window, and he heard the draw-bridge lowered, and the tread of horses' feet upon the causeway. But, little alarmed for the consequence of a pursuit during the darkness, he wrung the water from his dress, and, plunging into the moors, directed his course to the north-east by the assistance of the polar star.

END OF VOLUME SECOND,

the country. But little alarm for the appearance of a great deal of the to bring the water from his head and into the water, directed his course to the north-east by the assistance of the polar star.

END OF VOLUME SECOND.

BERLIN:

Printed by L. W. Krause.
